In Israel of old it seemed that the only way the attitude could be corrected was by the destruction of all which the people held precious. God warned through His prophets. But the prophets were denounced and killed. Whereas in better days the faithful were thrown to the lions by the heathen, now the faithful were thrown to the lions by their own people who believed as the heathen. Whereas before the people joined the prophets in denouncing the sins of the land now the people joined the land in denouncing the warnings of the prophets.

Only after all was destroyed could the people see that they had sinned. Only after they were carried into Babylonian captivity could they see that their blind captivity, in the culture and customs, the loves and loyalties of their times, was even more damning and devastating.

So it is good to remember that there is no worse pride than to say, “Look how I made it. I was born in a poor family with few advantages. But look how I made it. If every one would do like I did, they could make it too.” Why is it serious? Because it puts God out of our lives. It does not acknowledge His mercies and manifold blessings. And it pushes the poor and needy away so that they are outside our reach and concern. We excuse ourselves from helping because we place all blame on their heads. This is the kind of thinking and practice which God has never failed to punish. Do we think He will somehow overlook such pride on our part? Has He suddenly become a respecter of persons? — D

Yellow Creek Meeting Is Near

In preparation for the joint meeting of Mennonite General Conference, Board of Education, Board of Missions, and Publication Board to be held October 20-22 at Yellow Creek Mennonite Church, Goshen, Indiana, the Study Commission on Church Organization held a meeting on September 9 with the executive committees of the above organizations.

At this meeting the WMSC Executive Committee was also in attendance and made an excellent contribution. The women of the church have entered into the discussion on church organization in a serious and creative way. One could sense a certain excitement as the women expressed their sense of Spirit direction in their study of and response to the new proposed structure.

Each committee shared in a response to the proposed plan. The response and discussion was one of depth involvement. The following day the Commission spent further time reviewing and refining the proposal to be presented at Yellow Creek.

After a number of years of discussion at many different levels, after many, many changes and listening to a great variety of viewpoints, the Study Commission is planning to come to this October meeting with a proposal on which we can move ahead in adopting and implementing.

To adopt and begin implementing the proposal will not mean that no further changes can be made. The proposal is to be flexible enough that we can begin where we are presently and move toward the new, making necessary changes as we move.

In view of the important meeting of the church October 20-22 and in light of all the implications and work which will be still necessary following this meeting, the church is urged to pray for Holy Spirit guidance and discernment for these days of meeting. — D.

(A Baptismal Meditation)

From Grandson to Son

By Joseph Hertzler

At the age of twelve I stood in an evangelistic meeting. Before standing I was torn with indecision and uncertainties. I felt guilty and the evangelist was telling me how to get rid of that guilt. Finally after a number of nights of holding back — I stood. And sure enough, I felt better. The burden of guilt was lifted. I felt God loved me again and I loved God. I joined an instruction class along with a number of my friends and in due time we were all baptized and joined church.

It was a beautiful religious experience for me as a twelve-year-old — but it was not what I was told it was. I was told that now I was converted. I was in. So I was really puzzled when in two or three weeks my beautiful religious experience began to fade. I couldn’t understand that. I tried to hold on to it. I tried to be good. I didn’t enjoy feeling guilty. I wanted God to love me. I didn’t want to go to hell when I died.

Next year at revival time I again was feeling scared and guilty. I stood again. I guess that time I was classified a “backslider” returned to the fold. Again at fourteen and fifteen I stood. Four times what had happened to me was not what I was told it was. I think the ministers were good men, honest men, but somehow they didn’t understand what was happening — nor did I.

Each of these experiences was a legitimate religious experience, a meaningful spiritual encounter. But each was followed by a sense of failure and frustration. Looking back I think the reason for the failure, the reason I could not keep the vows and promises I made more than a few weeks, was that I was simply trying on secondhand religious fittings. I was experimenting with my parents’ faith. I was living up to the expectations of church and parents, reflecting what my environment expected of me.

What I didn’t know was that God loved me all the time — through thick and thin — I was part of the family, one of God’s grandsons. I was loved and I belonged but didn’t know it. I thought the only way to belong was to join up and then you had the security of church membership. On top of that to be really secure I thought I had to be good, that is, behave myself. (I never was too good at that.)

Paul Erb says, “They [boys and girls] want the security of church membership, with all it involves of a sense of belonging and of the approval of their elders. In various ways we have given them a feeling that they are outsiders, that they are not a part of our church family. And the feeling of exclusion becomes a terrifying thing to them. We have given them reason to think that it is only baptism that makes them a part of us.” That says it for me; that describes my experiences.

Now, I am not saying that the first four times I stood in revival meetings were not significant religious experiences. They were. In fact, given the expectations of the church, these may have been necessary prerequisites, necessary first steps, that then culminated in a master commitment two years later that has had lasting results, for it established a continuing relationship with Jesus Christ.

A 1955 General Conference statement reads, “A child may have many significant religious experiences before the age of accountability, such as finding security by trust in Christ, experiencing a sense of forgiveness for wrong acts, and enjoying private family and church worship and prayer.”

Again that describes my experience — but I think I would have experienced less frustration along the way had I been allowed to act my age, had I been allowed to be a child and then a young person. Instead, the rose was forced to bloom prematurely. I was denied the child’s right to an age of innocence. I was a grandson — but was told I was a son and should assume the responsibilities of a son. It is tough for a grandson to pretend that he is a son. I know.

Children and young persons may have, in fact should have, significant religious experiences. They have the need to make a number of commitments to God both before and later as they grow older after the so-called “age of accountability.” Children must progressively assume more and more responsibility as they grow older. Along the way they can and should make commitments to God.

A. Don Augsburger points out, however, that no commitment made during childhood or early youth can fully substitute for the master commitment that needs to be made in believer’s baptism. One of the early church fathers, Tertullian, asked, “Why hasten ye the innocent youths to the forgiveness of sins?” I believe a child, a young person, has the right to an age of innocence.

Early adolescence is the time of religious awakening. Early adolescence is the dawn of responsible manhood and womanhood in the moral realm or area of religion. Some call early adolescence the age of discretion. The ability to reason to a fuller extent is developed in the area of moral nature and assuming the consequences of one’s actions and decisions. The years of early adolescence, from about twelve to fourteen years of age, are exciting years of growth and discovery. It is a time of trying on secondhand religious fittings to see if they can become firsthand religious fittings.

The broad adolescence period from twelve to twenty-one is one of tremendous growth. It is believed that by the time you reach the age of seventeen or eighteen you are mentally mature or full grown. You do not have years of accumulated experience or a large backlog of past judgment and decisions to guide you — but you are mentally mature.

Now let us back up to middle adolescence which is roughly fifteen to seventeen. There seems to be rather widespread agreement among Christian educators and theologians in our church that a person in middle adolescence is capable of making the kind of master decision and commitment that needs to be made in believer’s baptism. One could call this the “age of accountability.” It comes after a period of moral awakening. Full moral responsibility emerges. One is able to answer with a responsible “yes” or a responsible “no” to the call of God. But it is difficult for parents and for the church to wait. It is difficult to let go and let a person grow and gradually take added responsibility and finally be a responsible person in their own right. It is difficult, and it is risky, for free will is involved. A person might say “no” when we want him to say “yes.” Certainly it is risky. But it is a risk that God is willing to take and so must we.

Baptism is not simply an automatic graduation exercise of each child raised in a Christian home and church. Baptism and the accompanying membership into the local visible church is voluntary. It is a choice which each person must make personally—not to get one’s parents off one’s back, or to meet the expectations of the congregation, nor is it the graduation exercise from the children’s Sunday school classes to the MYF class. No. One must want to become a disciple of Christ. He must recognize his need for forgiveness, knowing that he is not able to live a free, yet responsible, life without God’s help.

I was encouraged at the conclusion of the last series of instruction classes that each person did not automatically join the church. (Maybe that sounds strange to you.) In fact, four out of five felt they needed a little more time to weigh and think and decide. I was encouraged, for then I knew it wasn’t just an automatic graduation exercise. Each person was making an individual decision and knew it was their personal decision to make.

For baptism to be meaningful it must be responsible. It is not only an act of a gracious God; it is also the act of a respondent person. 2 Christian baptism is a symbol or a sign—but it is more than that. It is an experience—an experience in which the church and the candidate for baptism and God act together. There is a meeting of God and man.

It is a beautiful thing to be a grandson or granddaughter of God and be part of a church and a member of a Christian family. Children and young persons enjoy a distinct privilege. They are the object of their parents’ prayer and faith and dedication to God. Children and young persons in early adolescence are secure in God’s love.

It is also a beautiful thing to be a son or daughter of God—to trade in secondhand religious fittings for those which fit you as a person. This comes when one is mature enough to make a master commitment. This, in my judgment, is where the candidate for baptism is, and I recommend that he be baptized and received into church membership.

Christ, Israel, and Palestine

By Virgil J. Brenneman

Frequently I catch myself secretly applauding the military victories of the modern state of Israel over its Arab neighbors. But in my more Christian moments, I ask forgiveness for such sinful thoughts. For if I am honest as a Christian, I cannot condone either Arab terrorism or the retaliatory attacks by Israel. Furthermore, they both claim to have God and justice on their own side.

It is not hard to understand our easy sympathies for Israel. First of all, the Jews are the ethnic descendants of the "people of God" of the Old Testament. To this people Christians owe a great spiritual debt. It is the religious heritage which gave us the Old Testament and the promised Christ. Second, we cannot forget the millions of Jews that were murdered in a few short years of Nazi madness. Our sympathies are also stirred when we begin to comprehend the long history of anti-Semitic persecutions and the shame that large populations of "Christians" participated in these persecutions. My own feelings are further motivated by an easy tendency to identify with the "underdog." In this case, it is motivated by the contrast between the size and population of Israel as against the larger nations with whom she is in conflict.

Fulfillment in Christ

However, I cannot accept the premise, promoted by all too many Christian writers and speakers, that the Old Testament prophecies about the Jews are to be fulfilled in a particular way aside from their fulfillment in Christ. Here is where I differ rather sharply with some interpreters of modern events from Old Testament prophecy, often as if Christ were of little consequence. I believe this destroys the true place and uniqueness of Christ in history. It makes for strange theological positions and compromises for the Christian. It cuts the nerve of Arab-Jewish reconciliation for the Christian.

Any discussion or interpretation of either history, current events, or prophecy and its fulfillment ought instead to begin with Christ. Our view of Israel and the Arabs should be determined by our experience of the gospel. We ought to view events from the perspective of the New Testament rather than the Old Testament. The Old Testament helps us to understand the New Testament, to be sure; but the interpretation of the Bible and prophecy should be Christ-centered. That is, we view the whole Scripture in the light of the climactic revelation as it came through Jesus Christ.

Therefore, I submit that we must vigorously object to the use of the Old Testament Scriptures to justify Israel. Even among Jews there are those who see the actions of the modern state of Israel as a perversion of their vision and of God's intention. We must also resist the temptation to equate the modern secular state of Israel with the fulfillment of messianic prophecies.

These unfortunate associations make Christ of no consequence to the fulfillment of these prophecies, or to the salvation of either Jew or Arab. Those who make these associations interpret the Old Testament very much like a faithful Jew who still waits for the promised messiah.

The Gospels are replete with illustrations of persons who were familiar with and accurately quoted the Old Testament, but who missed the significance of Jesus. Even the disciples just before Jesus ascended to heaven asked Him about the time when He planned to restore the kingdom of Israel. They envisioned, like some do today, a political kingdom at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea. Jesus, instead, answered them with a promise of the Holy Spirit and power which would incorporate both Jew as well as non-Jew into the church. It was an expectation like that of the disciples which was the reason many in Jesus' time missed the Messiah.

Does God Deal Differently?

One serious objection to the above rejected mode of interpretation is that it is often implied that God somehow deals differently with modern Jews than He does with their contemporaries. There is the subtle implication that God has different ethical standards for carrying out His purposes with regard to justice for Jews than He does for others. It often legitimizes the use of military arms and war for what is seen as God's purpose—that of establishing a Jewish nation along ancient lines.

If a "just war" is legitimate for this "people of God," then why not for other "peoples of God"? But Christ is the salvation of the Jews in the same sense He is of the rest of us. If not, we Mennonites are wrong about non-resistance. I am uneasy that in the eventuality of the United States becoming more involved in the war in the Middle East even more Mennonites will lose their non-resistance than have lost it over the Vietnam War.

But God does not have a different standard or way of working with Jews than He does with Arabs or any others.

Virgil J. Brenneman, Groden, Ind., is a Mennonite minister and Executive Secretary for Student Services Committee.
If Amos or Jeremiah or any other Old Testament prophets were to speak their message today, they would as in their day fault both the Arab nations and Israel for their cruel and inhuman treatment of each other. As then, the prophets might first of all speak the judgment of God against the nations round about Israel for their murderous acts.

But if this word of judgment followed the Old Testament pattern, the prophets would, as they did then, speak an even more severe judgment against Israel. For the prophets saw ancient Israel also as covenant-breaker with God when they committed the same acts as the nations about them. What is unique about Christ is that today the message is the same to both Jew and Arab. Both come under the judgment of the gospel and both may share in the messianic future. All have equal access to God through Jesus Christ.

What Is Wrong?

This understanding has bearing on finding a just solution for the problems of the Middle East. The issues are very complex; but the pragmatic, expedient, or military answers toward finding a just peace have not been very productive. It is further complicated in that both Jew and Arab claim that God and justice is on their side. There is an element of truth in both their claims. However, both are wrong to use this claim to justify evil.

A just solution requires that consideration be given to both the legitimacy of the claims of the Palestinian Arab to his properties and his homeland, the land of Palestine, as well as the legitimacy of the desire of the Jews for security. What is really wrong about the current situation is that both Israel and the Arab nations have been practicing an "eye-for-eye-and-tooth-for-tooth" justice through retaliatory raids, bombings, and shellings.

The gospel discounts this kind of justice. Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount announced another way. Matthew 5:38-42. But Jesus' way is rejected by both Jew and Arab as it is by most peoples of the earth, including, unfortunately, also those who claim to follow Jesus. Churches are often more committed to the old eye-for-eye justice than to Jesus' way! They come under the judgment of God for failing to obey Christ in this matter. There is no way by which the followers of the gospel can justify the retaliatory strikes of either side in the Middle East.

If the Old Testament prophecies have any bearing on the modern state of Israel, then it would be to speak to her unfaithfulness for trusting in guns, armies, and military alliances instead of trusting God. (See Isaiah 30:1-3; 31:1-3, as well as many other passages.)

If she persists in taking into her own hands the meting out of justice, a prerogative that belongs only to God, then she will be destroyed. Both Arab and Jew today do not put their trust in God, but in the might of their bombers and in alliances with the superpowers — the United States and USSR.

How Accomplished?

Furthermore, the New Testament is clear that when God vindicates His people it will be by the "sword . . . of his mouth," which is really the Word of Christ. (Revelation 19:11-21; see also 1:16; 2:12 and 16; and Hebrews 4:12.) Because of the apocalyptic language of the Book of Revelation, some mistakenly imagine that God will subdue His enemies and the enemies of His people by real bloodshed, by real war, by massive killings, none of which can be reconciled to the gospel.

It should be noted that the declaration that Christ will subdue or overcome with the "sword . . . of his mouth," stands in one of the most "bloody" passages in the Book of Revelation. But this "sharper than any twoedged sword" is the Word of God. The countenancing of war by modern Israel is sufficient evidence that she does not yet share in the messianic promises or future. The people of God beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Both Arab and Jewish nations function as secular states without regard to Jesus Christ.

But what of the promises to Abraham and to Israel in the Old Testament covenants? Is God not faithful to keep them? Indeed He is and He does keep them. The New Testament is not only clear that all the law and prophets are fulfilled in Jesus Christ, but that all the promises are in Him too. 2 Corinthians 1:20; Romans 15:8, etc. The coming of Jesus Christ, His resurrection, and the gift of the Holy Spirit are evidence that God is true to His promises. The purposes for which Abraham and Israel were chosen, to bless and bring salvation to the nations is accomplished in Jesus Christ.

The inheritors of the promises are "the true seed of Abraham" and the true Israel those circumcised in the heart (or shall we read born again). The true Israel is not a political, national, or even ethnic Jewish community, but it is the people of God by virtue of being in Christ.

The New Testament is absolutely clear as to who are the people of God. Those in Christ are the chosen race, the holy nation, God's own people. 1 Peter 2:9. They along with Christ are the inheritors of the Abrahamic and other promises through a new covenant which displaces and makes obsolete the old covenants. (Study carefully Hebrews 6 to 11.) Ethnic Jews are not any more the inheritors of the promises than are ethnic Arabs, or ethnic Mennonites, or ethnic Christians. Galatians 3:26-29; Romans 2:28, 29; 9:6, 7; Matthew 3:8, 9; and John 8:39.

I, a man in Christ, am now a joint heir with Him, and therefore, a recipient or inheritor of all the promises made to God's chosen people in the Old and New Testaments. I share in the covenant responsibilities as well. That privilege is open to Jew and Arab alike.

When Paul (Rom. 9 and 10) tells us about a time for Israel after the time of the Gentiles is fulfilled, he is not arguing for the establishment of the Jewish state, but for their return from unbelief to Christ. His longing for them is that they might be saved. The call to Gentile or Arab is predicated on the same conditions. Even the prophecies or promises which have to do with specific events, and with the “promised land,” can be seen to be fulfilled in the life of Jesus (for example, Matt. 2:15; Hos. 11:1; Ex. 4:22, 23) or His church.

Furthermore, those promises which speak of an established home or place of rest or a secure kingdom must be balanced against those which speak of “strangers and pilgrims” or “no abiding city.” The “true Israelites” are not only the inheritors of the land in the Middle East, but of the whole earth. Matthew 5:5; 1 Corinthians 3:21-23. And Christians should rejoice in their inheritance.

_Pro-Jew and pro-Arab_

I have learned long ago in counseling couples with marriage problems that one can give no help whatsoever if one takes sides, no matter how much the fault appears to be one-sided. I also learned that if one consistently tries to be impartial when dealing with marriage conflicts either party or both may accuse you of taking the opposite side, especially if one or the other is not honest about participating in the solution. There may be some, depending on their biases, who will accuse me of being on one side or the other in this writing.

However, the Christian is both pro-Jew and pro-Arab. He cannot be indifferent to the problems or to the dilemmas of the Middle East conflict. He is concerned that both receive justice and for the sake of both seeks to reconcile them in order that bloodshed and war may cease and that they may learn to live together in peace. Acts of vengeance and retaliation, if continued, will simply escalate to more death and destruction for both. Neither Jew nor Arab will be spared the awful judgment. Both, if past attitudes and methods continue, will eventually destroy themselves according to the testimony of the prophets and history. No matter how hard it is to give up our pet peeves, pet sympathies, or pet eschatologies, we must desire peace, justice, and salvation for both.

But Christians have already experienced that Christ has broken down the dividing wall between peoples through reconciliation to God, thus bringing an end to hostility (Eph. 2:14 ff.), thus establishing a new community of the people of God.

If we take seriously this fact and the church’s mission of reconciliation, we will without partiality invite both Jew and Arab to abandon the idolatry of insisting that God is on their own side and to seek instead for what is the will of God. It is the faith of the New Testament that that will is found through Jesus Christ. I believe that God is both pro-Jew and pro-Arab. We must find ways to communicate this truth to those who will receive it.

We have hostilities among ourselves because we have not achieved peace with God.—Kenneth Good.

Sometimes the study of a book is the spark needed to ignite dormant ideas. When Journey Inward, Journey Outward by Elizabeth O’Connor soaked into the nerve fiber of several sharing groups at Emmanuel Church in La Junta, Colorado, new commitments resulted. The “Love-in-Action” group was born and almost immediately they pooled their financial resources to assist a young mother in the church. Warmth, support, and caring were demonstrated in various ways. The group developed a rhythm of sharing life with each other and seeking out persons in special need of love and caring. Significantly, these creative group members are in the above-thirty age bracket.

A mothers’ sharing group examined the Washington, D.C., Church of the Saviour’s method of discerning gifts. Vigorous discussions ensued with enough unanswered questions to stimulate further research. Our discovery: mission becomes authentic when we begin to discern personal gifts. Discovery must be followed by making these gifts available to the church community and by giving generously. Only then can the total body determine what shape the local congregation’s mission should take.

The Search group, composed of young adults, was the setting to share life as it is. A circle of seeking persons seated themselves around an old kerosene lamp and began to test each other. Were the others to be trusted? Were they phony or real? Would there be acceptance, no matter what was expressed? Could these people — would they — help heal unresolved hurts? They could, and did. This expression provided reason for being alive and even reason for being a part of the church — provided that “the church” means a caring group of persons available to each other.

Into this kind of fertile soil teaching on the lordship of Christ and stewardship of life can be sown. And behold, some seed can germinate and produce fruit, sometimes different from any we have previously seen, but surely Spirit-grown.

The total congregation has become very much involved in the Let My People Choose Poverty-Affluence mission study. The encouraging aspect of this has been the ability to become emotionally involved, rather than merely intellectualizing. Some life patterns are beginning to change. This fall we will further confront Poverty-Affluence issues.

Within the context of these and similar relational groups, one congregation is in the process of finding its mission.

Sylvia Jantz is a pastor’s wife at Emanuel Mennonite Church, La Junta, Colo., and serves on the general WMSA executive committee.
A Cheerful Giver
By Carl Smeltzer

Tax tables are set up by our federal, state, and local governments to tell us how much we should pay them. Before any modern tax tables were written, God gave us His Word to tell us how much of our income He wants. I am impressed with the illustrations of 100 percent giving that are in the Bible. God gave “his only begotten Son.” That is 100 percent giving. Jesus gave His life on the cross. That also is 100 percent giving. Jesus commended the widow who gave her two mites. No one else knew it was all she had — 100 percent giving. Luke 14:33 says, “Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.” A disciple willingly recognizes that 100 percent of him and his possessions belongs to the Lord.

I am glad that from early youth my parents encouraged me to tithe my income. I also read of those committed to the Lord who scrupulously set aside the Lord’s portion before any was spent from their income for themselves. (Actually, the government gets the first portion from a paycheck.)

During the time I was in high school I went with my father to hear Milo Kauffman speak at the Holdeman Mennonite Church near Wakarusa, Indiana. Bro. Kauffman’s talks helped me to see that I needed to give more than 10 percent of my income. I have held Bro. Kauffman dear ever since. I thank God that He used Bro. Kauffman to teach me this. Why is it that some people get sore and criticize the preacher for preaching on what Christ taught so much about — our relationship to our possessions?

Since our marriage, our family has been blessed many times over by giving cheerfully as the Lord has prospered. As He has prospered has meant giving more than 10 percent of net income for my wife and I. We wouldn’t want to go back to giving less. Considering the fact that we have two children, many people have said that we couldn’t even give 10 percent while I was working part time, while we were buying a house, a car, etc. But the Lord never told us we couldn’t! He said we could. We just believed Him! And He did it for us. Praise His name! He used other people to help us.

During our first two years of married life, my wife and I were both in school. Even then we gave regularly because we felt giving was a part of worship. We also felt giving is only a part of our total commitment to our Savior. We have found that one can give as much (or as little) as he sets his heart upon giving.

Some people say a preacher or a solicitor should not say how much a person should give. However, some of these same people will say how much certain people can not give. The latter is only the negative of the former. I feel neither approach is the best. Rather, let us base our motives for giving on the New Testament principles.

1 Corinthians 16:2 says, everyone should give as God has prospered him. We should give to needy brethren (Jas. 2:15, 16, and 1 Jn. 3:17). Ephesians 4:28 broadens this out to give to anyone who has need, not just the brethren. Do we inform ourselves concerning the needy in the church and the world? Or do we try to avoid responsibility by quoting Jesus’ words, “Give to him that asketh thee . . .” (Mt. 5:42). Our Lord has made it clear that Christians are to frequently take the initiative in helping other people. He hardly leaves room for us to sit back, relaxed in our rocking chairs, unconcerned until someone rocks us loose by a knock on our door. Jesus said, “Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest” (Jn. 4:35). This He spoke when the disciples thought there was plenty of time until harvest. Jesus was speaking of the need they could see then and there. In the Great Commission He commanded them to broaden their vision to a worldwide view of the spiritual need of people.

Yes, God loves a cheerful giver — the more cheerful, the better. I think so, don’t you?

To a Sick Friend

I pray the Lord will fill your need
For health and strength for which you plead.
He’ll grant the faith, if He so wills,
For healing balm for all your ills.

But most of all for this I pray,
That whatsoever comes your way,
Your love and trust in God may rest.
He knows and loves and does what’s best.

You Helped Convention 70 Happen

Dear Fellow Christians,

I must share briefly with you. From the dim dreams of two years ago and the hard work since, something emerged at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina, from August 16 to 22 that humanly speaking is explainable.

As you know, 1,700 young people and adults gathered that week for a youth convention. As churchwide youth secretary, I tried to coordinate things: Don Kraybill, Lancaster youth director, moderated the sessions; Don Jacobs, Tom Skinner, and Dave Augsburger were among the speakers; 200 people led discussion and seminar groups. But what happened at Convention 70 was not our doing.

Whose "thing" was Convention 70?

CONVENTION 70 WAS A DOING OF GOD'S SPIRIT! No other explanation is possible. For 1,700 young people with all their differences in family background, styles of life and music and dress, and expressions of faith and unfaith to get together today and actually experience an indescribable unity in joy and love is no human accomplishment. Only God could make that happen.

For the most part, Convention 70 was beyond my wildest dreams. God knows that I tried to pray that He would get next to young people that week. But He also knows how weak my faith actually was and how scared of defeat I became. (Why! There was even a point last spring when I was ready to throw in the towel because it didn't look like enough youth would register to even have a convention! And I said to a few others, "I believe this will be our last convention. Youth just don't like to get together in big groups anymore.")

God knows, too, how we asked you all to pray for our week together at Lake Junaluska. YOU WERE praying. And that helped lots. I can get discouraged fast. But at Junaluska your prayers helped calm and hope increase as the week progressed. I remember sitting down with a pastor Tuesday afternoon and listening to his disturbed reservations about the music (too much of it was in the folk and folk-rock idioms) and Tom Skinner’s first presentation (he talked too much about revolution and the young people would read him all wrong). I was moved to say, "But we are here for a week and we have until Friday. God's Spirit is here and He is going to work among us yet." God used your prayers. He helped that pastor to a breakthrough which enabled him to begin giving himself in love and joy to young people.

And God helped some disturbed and alienated young people who came to convention pretty fed up with the church to go away with new hope that He is alive in a church that is willing to face up to the issues confronting youth and the world today. God helped a lot of youth who had not experienced much more than criticism from the church for their behavior, music, and dress patterns to find acceptance by Spirit-filled people who cared enough to love them without being critical.

And youth drank that in because they are hungry for the kind of love that demonstrates itself with real affection. The Holy Spirit poured His reconciling love upon us, breaking us up in confession and freeing us to be open with each other. He created COMMUNITY! Our final Friday morning worship experience gave witness to this. We gave opportunity for anyone to share what he wanted to with the whole assembly. It's not easy for anyone to speak before 1,700 people. But young people lined up behind four microphones to confess and share, to praise God, and give words of encouragement to us all. I am not ashamed to say that I sat there and cried with joy. Jesus revealed Himself in that community. It was perfectly beautiful.

True, not all that happened at Convention 70 was good. Some young people left Lake Junaluska still untouched by God’s Spirit, allowing themselves instead to be controlled by other spirits. We need to keep on praying and opening ourselves to each other and to them so that the Holy Spirit can break into our congregations and create loving fellowships which will attract young people to Jesus instead of forcing them into our molds or turning them away in bitterness.

And we bear responsibility, too, for those young people who came back to us from Lake Junaluska with new joy in their hearts but who felt afraid that we wouldn't understand what had happened to them and would try to dampen their new enthusiasm. We bear responsibility to listen in love when they express frustration that "my home church is not like it was at Convention." I pray that you will accept them and their stories. Praise God for the evidence of growth you see. Be quick to express joy and love to them. Be slow to criticize the immaturity in faith, life, and belief that you see coming through. They are still young people — less mature than you who are adults.

With God's help, accept them and their youthfulness. Opening yourself to the Holy Spirit's love, help to create a climate of warmth and acceptance, and you will have the joy of watching young people continue maturing in the faith. Pray about what you see in them that you don't like. But let the Holy Spirit take care of it while you LOVE. (And express that love with a warm handshake or an arm around the shoulder.) When you don’t feel loving, make confession with tears. And the Holy Spirit will groan with your broken spirit and make of you the kind of person who can walk together with your young people in the light of Jesus.

Thank you again for praying about Convention 70. Let us keep working together — young and old — in the name and spirit of Jesus.

I stood watching the moon and the occasional bursts of flares shot against the sky from Hontré Island. Nha Trang’s beach was almost silent. I was alone.

“You don’t have a friend?” The question interrupted my musing. I turned around and saw a small girl standing some distance behind me. Her face beamed a smile that showed she was teasing. She had features both Vietnamese and Caucasian: large, dark eyes; tousled hair, almostauburn; her nose, delicate and straighter than most Vietnamese. She wore blue trousers and a blouse, both slightly smudged with dirt. She held her hands behind her back and looked at me with her chin forward. Surprise and curiosity at her presence nearly made me forget she had asked a question.

After a few moments’ hesitation, I responded with a brisk “No,” shaking my head for emphasis.

“Are you an American?” she asked, judging from the color of my brown skin. I didn’t answer.

“Do you speak Vietnamese?” she asked, still smiling.

“A little,” I said. At this point my response to her was still cold, because I had met many children like this, who make friends with a foreigner for a few moments for the sake of ten piasters. They come around, ask the few questions similar to the ones I had just been asked, and then hold out their hands for money. If I give them money, I immediately become “Number One” and “OK”; if not, I am “Number Ten” and must face their disapproval.

But something about this child was different. She seemed genuinely interested in me. After a while I stepped over to her and asked her in Vietnamese to sit down and talk with me. Through our conversation I learned that her name was Lien and that she was seven years old.

“Do you have brothers and sisters, Lien?” I asked her.

“I have no parents,” she replied. Her smile faded and her eyes looked toward the sea. Her face showed a brief expression of pain as if the thought of her parents evoked memories of a deep hurt. Had her parents died when she was an infant before she had any brothers and sisters? Had they deserted her, or separated? I waited for her to speak again.

She changed her position, and still keeping her eyes on the water she slipped her small hand into mine. Finally she began to tell me what she knew about her family. Part of the story had been told to her by her grandmother (now dead) and part of it she remembered herself. Her father, who was an American adviser in Vietnam, left one night and they had heard no more about him. Some years later soldiers from North Vietnam killed her mother, because she had lived with an American. The murder of her mother, her screams, the loud gunshots in the room, and her mother’s blood on the floor were still vivid in Lien’s memory.

Then I understood why Lien was on this beach all alone. She did not have a home. As I watched her closely, I sensed she had not eaten for many hours. “When did you eat rice last, Lien?” (In Vietnamese, the expression “to eat rice” means “to eat.”)

She paused before she spoke. Reluctantly, softly, she answered, “Yesterday afternoon.”

“Yesterday afternoon!” I repeated her answer, and in my mind I asked myself, And what did she eat? And how many more Liens are there, hungry, maybe even starving? I felt compelled, as one does sometimes, to do something. I grasped her little hand tighter and led her toward a nearby outdoor restaurant.

It was hearty Vietnamese food and Lien ate hungrily. While we were eating, I told her I was from India, working in a Christian hospital. Knowing she would not understand what a laboratory technician was, I simply explained I examined patients’ blood to see what made them sick. As she finished the last mouthful, an uncomfortable feeling started growing in me, for I knew I would soon have to tell her good-bye.

As we stood outside the restaurant, I made myself say the words, “I have to go home now.” For what seemed many moments Lien looked up at me in silence with a sad face. Then, breaking the spell cast by her eyes, I touched her cheek and walked away from her with determined strides. I knew I was leaving her to an uncertain destiny — on the beach or wherever she could find a place to exist. I was leaving her to listen to the whispering waves of the ocean. Perhaps they could tell her about her future.

Now and then in my moments of solitary thought, I can still hear Lien’s small voice asking, “Don’t you have a friend?” and I am left to wonder if she asked that question for me or for herself.

Preparing Parents for College

By Katie Funk Wiebe

When Julius Caesar came to the Rubicon in his battle for world supremacy, he uttered the famous words, "The die is cast," and crossed the river. Success or defeat lay ahead.

Many parents adopt Caesar's attitude when they pack up son or daughter with clothes, books, typewriter, and radio and send him or her off to college. Uppermost is the thought: "We've done what we could for our children. The die is cast. What happens to our children while they are flung about in the centrifuge of learning is no longer in our hands. All that is left for us now is to pray."

If a parent spends only ten minutes considering what is happening on some college campuses and begins to speculate what may happen, even prayer seems to be a very tenuous thread by which to hold our children to God when they face a new environment.

In the next few years, the college student will probably make some of the most important decisions of his life regarding marriage, vocation, and life philosophy. Interwoven with these will be lesser decisions like whether sleep or classes is more important, whether to go to church because his parents want him to or to stay at home. He may experiment with traditional taboos of the church such as drinking and smoking to signify his liberation, he may get excited about various causes and ideologies.

The risks seem to be so great that when son or daughter goes off to college, most parents would prefer the kind of warranty that comes with a new appliance to dependence on prayer. Wouldn't it be comforting to have a sort of four-year guarantee that promises that the young person's faith and values will be untampered with by college professor or fellow student or the temper of the times?

But colleges don't hand out such warranties, for students always change. That is why they were sent to college. Only stones and clods show no signs of life.

The change in the student may not always be the kind a parent wants to see. When son or daughter returns home from college for vacation or summer work, it may be with doubts, often with questions, sometimes with new behavior patterns. Parents, feeling their inadequacies to cope with the new sophisticate, become fearful and defensive.

I believe that prayer will always be important, but it must be more than simply wishing our child onto our plateau of spirituality in order to protect him from life's problems and to protect us from his problems. And to prayer must be added a greater understanding of the student's problems and a greater measure of love and forgiveness.

As I watch college students, I realize that the Christian faith of many entering freshmen is necessarily fragile because it has been untested by experience and the world of ideas, yet some green beanie wearers feel ready to conquer the world.

The young student has two choices: he can split his life into two compartments with one division for his spiritual life and one for his academic and social life, or he can integrate his faith with all of his life. Maybe some students flounder so soon because their parents have lived a compartmentalized life all their lives and have never moved faith into daily life.

If the student can face what may seem like very viable options to Christianity such as existentialism, moral relativism, or hedonism, his faith will be stronger and his value system surer than if he remains a Christian mostly by virtue of his heritage and the crowd he travels with.

I think that parents will be helped if they can accept that the contemporary expression of the faith of the young person may be quite different from theirs because the world they are growing up into is very different. The times are changing and with them modes of music, worship, and witnessing. I thought of this when I read recently that when actor Pat Boone leads a person to Christ, he immediately baptizes him in his backyard swimming pool.

I belong to that group of parents who for years have lived in heavily churched communities, quite insulated from the world. I have worked mostly in church-related institutions which meant that for days I might never speak to a non-Christian other than to pay a bill. I heard whispers that life wasn't all like this.

When I returned to university studies, I realized that the world is not like Hillsboro or Corn or Mountain Lake. I found it to be a world in which Christian truth receives little recognition, where sin has lost its identity. It is a world in which simple, glib formulas do not provide answers to the problems of mass suffering, inequality, injustice, and corrupt living.

Knowing this, I try to take the doubts of college-age young people more seriously and not to stifle honest questioning with categorical answers. And I continue to probe within myself whether I worship the institution which bears Christianity more than the living God. This is, after all, what is most important.

The crime rate in the United States during the past decade has risen by 148 percent, according to the Uniform Crime Reports—1969, which are issued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The National Crime Index or rate, according to the report, rose 10.6 percent over 1968. The report showed that the crime rate, or number of crimes for each 100,000 persons, was 2,471. In 1968, the rate was 2,234.8.

The report was released by U.S. Attorney General John N. Mitchell. In noting that serious crime in this country had increased 148 percent in the 60s, Mr. Mitchell said that the rate of increase had slowed in 1969.

An estimated 700 English churches may be declared surplus in the next 10 years and offered for sale.

More than 30 old English parish churches have already been declared redundant. Some may find overseas owners.

The church commissioners said most inquiries came from Canadians, some of whom would like to have a church from the area of their ancestry.

In some cases, churches no longer needed for religious purposes are preserved as historic monuments. Others are considered for use as youth centers or libraries.

More than half of the United Methodist theological students responding to a recent survey cited the pastor as the most influential factor in their decisions to enter the ministry.

The national survey, conducted by the United Methodist Board of Education's Department of the Ministry, included 2,403 students representing 55 theological schools. The study included only former Methodist students and others enrolled at Methodist seminaries.

Young people are tired of being used as status symbols by parents and of having to earn love, the Southern Baptist Sunday School leadership conference was told.

The Rev. William Self of Atlanta, Ga., discussed some of the things youth would tell their parents if the adults would listen.

The teenaged generation, the clergyman said, is "sick" of being a status symbol through such things as grades in school.

In addition to this, Mr. Self said, young persons are "sick of having to earn love. Parents try to put controls on love by judging the performance of their children in areas such as grades, little league baseball, and other status symbols of youth society."

It was his judgment that "parents are too concerned about surface things, such as hair." He asked: "Would you let an inch of hair separate you from your children?"

Even more costly may be the vanity publishers who advertise for manuscripts in local newspapers. Their tricky contracts may leave an author penniless with hundreds of books to sell on his own. Beware of any publisher who asks for your money to publish your book. A credited publisher pays authors.

American Friends and Service Committee filed suit against Internal Revenue Service. The essence of the suit was expressed by AFSC national associate executive secretary, Louis Schneider, when he asked, "Does the government have the right to compel us to withhold taxes from employees who have conscientious scruples against participation in war in any form?"

"As an organization founded fifty-three years ago to respect individual conscience, we believe the First Amendment protects us from being compelled to violate the consciences of employees, who because of religious training and belief, uphold the historic Quaker peace testimony."

There's a pragmatic consideration, as well as a moral one. Feeling bound to respect the consciences of the individual staff members who requested that war tax money not be withheld from their pay, the AFSC stopped withholding an amount equal to 51.6 percent of the total Federal income tax. Feeling bound to respect the law, the AFSC complied with it by taking an amount equal to the funds not withheld from staff members' salaries from its general funds, and paid it to the Internal Revenue Service. The AFSC then applied to the IRS for a refund, but was denied.

"Christians for Peace," organized recently in the Harrisonburg, Va., area, attempts to show that peace is a life-style and more than a tool to use when war threatens.

Consisting of area pastors and laymen, the organization has already taken concrete action by producing a poster and decal which declare "Peace Is Patriotic." Over 10,000 posters and decals have been requested by persons in more than 40 states.

The group's first product, a poster picturing a dove, a flag, and the proclamation "Peace Is Patriotic," may be purchased at 60 cents each or 2/$1. The message is also available in decals at 25 cents each or 6/$1. Address all correspondence to: Christians for Peace, Box 206, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801.

A declining job market in the U.S. is creating difficulties for conscientious objectors needing alternative service to military duty, an interreligious agency reported.

The situation is one in which objectors whose lottery numbers are called may find it necessary to seek their own "appropriate" work outside traditional categories: This was the advice of the National Interreligious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors (NISBCO) in its August newsletter.

"Some states apparently don't have I-W jobs to propose to registrants who do not find 'appropriate' work on their own," reported the conscientious objector agency's newsletter. "California has been sending conscientious objectors as far east as Ohio in recent months.

An increase in applications from conscientious objectors has taken place since the U.S. Supreme Court broadened the basis for the category last June. However, NISBCO did not link the shortage of I-W jobs to this development.

Television has been scored by a Nazarene leader as a chief factor in "demoralizing American homes" and contributing in a "trend toward moral compromise."

Dr. Edward Lawlor, a general superintendent of the Church of the Nazarene, charged that while television "can be used for good," it is utilized "almost exclusively for evil."

He addressed the denomination's quadrennial Laymen's Conference on Evangelism.

"As a denomination we have refused to go to the theater," Dr. Lawlor stated. "Now television brings the nightclubs and the theater into our homes."

Support of President Nixon's Vietnam war policy has increased noticeably among Southern Baptist leaders since the incur-
The burial remains of Sarepta, a Phoenician city well known in biblical times, was uncovered in an open field overlooking the Mediterranean by a team of archaeologists led by Dr. James Bennett Pritchard. Sarepta had originally stood between Tyre and Sidon on the coast of Lebanon—the homeland of the Phoenicians who were first colonizers of the Mediterranean and the transmitters of our alphabet.

Mentioned in the Old Testament Book of Kings, Sarepta was the city where Elijah was sent to stay with a poor widow during a famine.

Here Elijah miraculously increased the supply of oil and flour to feed the family and restored the life of the widow’s dead son.

The mound holding ancient Sarepta eventually revealed 24 floors and occupation levels built up over 1,200 years. Dr. Pritchard’s team uncovered 10 rooms and 2 courts used largely for private homes.

Dr. Pritchard estimated that the city extends for at least 10 acres or more. The excavation revealed household wares and clay ovens, implying that bread played an important part in the diet of Phoenicians.

Informed persons are raising their voices against the intense competition which arises when early adolescents and preadolescents engage in public contests in sports. An assistant principal in Iowa speaks out in the latest issue of Today’s Education (May 1970). In an article, “Little League Can Hurt Kids,” he says: “For years child psychologists have contended that little league activity is creating too much pressure and tension for participating youngsters.” In another article on an adjoining page, a surgeon is quoted as reporting that “X rays made of 40 little league pitchers in a California city showed in every instance some evidence of physical change in the throwing arm.” When bones of the arm are involved this change is irreversible. Pupils from ages eight to twelve should be barred from competition (in public contests) in the interests of their health, he contends.

Israel archaeologists have uncovered remains of the “Broad Wall” mentioned in the Old Testament Book of Nehemiah (3:8 and 12:38).

The biblical reference occurs in connection with a description of the restoration of Jerusalem fortifications after the return of the Jews from Babylonian exile.

Professor Nahman Avigad of the Hebrew University said that an 80-foot stretch of wall approximately 23 feet thick had been found on bedrock 300 yards west of the Temple Mount.

The wall of boulders and roughly cut stone varied from 3 to 10 feet in height, he reported.

The archaeologist said a wall 23 feet thick was unusual in the Israelite period and would have been described as "broad."

“For the first time in 25 years, public schoolteachers are having to scramble for jobs,” says the U.S. News and World Report for July 6, 1970. Moreover, the estimated 1970 surplus of 6,000 teachers is expected to increase annually until it reaches 55,000 in 1975. Hopefully, this will make it easier to find qualified teachers for Christian schools.

A current reply to the question, "Where does the money go?" can be answered, to everyone’s misfortune, "down the inflation drain, and at faster speeds," says the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

For example, if you are one of the thousands of Americans investing in either a savings account or life insurance, you were also one of those who suffered losses totaling $60 billion last year in the value of these two investments, all because of inflation.

While many factors contribute to the dollar’s erosion, our own national government must take the primary blame for adding fuel to inflationary fires with its continuing excessive spending, and the resulting budget deficits.

In just over two years, the value of the dollar has declined 11 percent. This can be traced to the enormous $25 billion deficit incurred by the Federal Government for the 1968 fiscal year.

Some of the traditional attitudes toward the weaker sex seem to be falling victim of twentieth-century legislation, and the business community finds itself perplexed as to how female employees should now be treated, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reports.

Consider the case of Libbey-Owens-Ford, which felt it was in the right by observing such Ohio laws as the ones protecting women from lifting heavy objects in their work, or from having to work long hours.

Not so, said the Federal Government, charging the company with discriminating against the female workers in the first such court case filed. The basis of the suit is the equal employment opportunities protection of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Who knows what will happen if the constitutional amendment giving women equal rights under all laws—already approved by the House—becomes the law of the land?

Church of the Nazarene laymen were challenged to win a half million persons to Christ and double the size of their denomination in the next ten years.

The training of Christians to be “soul winners” was declared top priority if the church is to advance against unrest and lawlessness.

Dr. John L. Knight, a Nazarene executive, told the more than 1,600 delegates at the quadrennial Laymen’s Conference on Evangelism that this is the time before the final turnaround from the church, mentioned in the New Testament.

People’s hearts are hungry for the Lord, he declared. “Therefore, in our circles, we have some of the greatest soul winning revivals.”

Delegates were urged to become “model churchmen” in winning souls for Christ. Dr. Knight, executive secretary of the department of evangelism, cited four “outstanding qualities” of such a model.

“A model churchman,” the executive said, “must be devoted to the church, he must have the ability to see what a person could become by the grace of God, be must possess leadership abilities, and he must be a good soul winner.”

The $350 billion total we will have finally spent on the war in Vietnam could have bought the lasting allegiance of all Southeast Asia (and India to boot) through constructive revolutionary development, with $100 million left over to rebuild our own decaying society. Are we to continue this kind of folly, draining our nation of its resources to implement the fears that arise because we don’t understand the changes evolving around us?

James L. Clayton, University of Utah economist, in testimony before the subcommittee on Economy in Government in 1969, pointed out that the largest money costs of war come long after the fighting stops—in veterans’ hospitals, benefits, etc. In our five major wars these have averaged more than three times the original cost of the conflicts themselves.
SCCO Introduces a “Plan for Mennonite Church Organization”

The Study Commission on Church Organization will report to the Joint Conference on Church Organization to be held at the Yellow Creek Church, Goshen, Ind., Oct. 20-22, 1970. This report is entitled “A Plan for Mennonite Church Organization.” It represents several years of study and proposes a new structure for the Mennonite Church. It will be considered by the four agencies who sponsored the study: Mennonite General Conference, Board of Missions, Publication Board, and Board of Education.

If the report is approved, the next step will be to organize a Constitutional Assembly in August 1971, to adopt bylaws for the new organization. Immediately after that the new structure can take effect.

This Plan represents further study and work following up the report to General Conference at Turner, Ore., in August 1969, and to the three Boards. The report has been rewritten to reflect the benefit of an extended listening process throughout the church during the past nine months.

Copies of the Plan and Implementation Proposals have been mailed to all the delegates to the Yellow Creek meeting and will be mailed to all visitors who register.

Other interested persons may secure a copy by addressing the SCCO Office, Box 128, Salunga, Pa. 17538.

The major features of the new Plan are summarized in the following paragraphs.

Every Person

The church has a rich heritage of gifts. Its resources are not primarily material but rather personal—persons with their Spirit-given gifts. The developments of recent years have symbolized the varied patterns of our brotherhood. A new awareness is emerging that there are many groups and persons whose gifts have not been used. The lay members, women, youth, and minorities together represent a full-orbed brotherhood. A dynamic pattern of organization will recognize and give freedom to all these gifts.

One alternative would be to build in assurances that every group will be represented at every level so that brotherhood organization and structure is truly reflective of the varied composition of the membership. On the other hand, it is equally, or more, important that persons should be chosen because of their gifts and potential contribution, not because they are young or old, black or white, male or female, ordained or unordained. Every person should have the assurance that he is needed and wanted as a person to fill a place of responsibility and is not assigned simply because he happens to fall into a certain category.

The SCCO is making provision in the Nominating Committee process for broad representation of the life of the church to be taken into account in the selection of nominees. Efforts will be made to secure new names of qualified people who come from varied backgrounds. No provision is being made for guaranteed representation, lest we defeat our expressed desire to see every person as important in his gift and personal contribution.

It should be pointed out, however, that the Plan does provide for lay members to be included in the regional assemblies as direct representatives of congregations. A Women’s Missionary and Service Commission is planned in relation to the Board of Congregational Ministries and a Minority Ministries Council is included with the Mission Board.

Congregational Centrality

The Plan is based on the congregation’s central role in church organization. Here God’s covenant people gather in an authentic fellowship. Here are those who share a primary relationship because they live in the same community forming the local expression of the body of Christ.

The congregation is not autonomous or independent. It cannot be complete unless it looks beyond itself and becomes a part of the larger brotherhood. The quality of its life and involvement will determine in a large measure the quality of the larger fellowship.

On the other hand, much more emphasis is needed on the development of a spiritually vital involvement at the congregational level. The whole brotherhood in its primary congregational relationship must effectively participate in decision-making and church life.

If the congregation is the basic unit of church organization, matters of life and witness should be handled as close to the local level as possible. But this must be balanced with a wider circle of relationships so that the congregation can participate in a larger resource of leadership and fellowship beyond itself.

The centrality of the congregation is symbolized in the congregational idea being carried into all levels of church relationship. At every stage of organization those who participate form a new “congregation” and carry on their relationship in a congregational manner. For all practical purposes, the successive levels of organization become “congregations of congregations” truly reflecting the congregational spirit and the congregational life at the basic local level.

The first level of widening relationship is the cluster, an informal relationship of congregations who choose to share in certain functions, facilities, or fellowship activities. This recognizes the need for flexibility in developing new and creative relationships with other nearby congregations.

The cluster pattern symbolizes a new dimension for interchurch relationships inasmuch as many congregations may want to develop such contacts on an informal basis. This provides more freedom than one unilateral denominational decision which may or may not be meaningful or relevant to every local congregation.

Intermediate Levels

Beyond the local congregation and cluster there needs to be intermediate levels which provide for the next step in organizational structure. These levels must be closely identified with the congregation and must accept responsibility for decisions and questions of primary significance to that particular area. A multilevel relationship preserves the integrity of the congregation as it enables the congregation to receive a more effective hearing than it could at the denominational level if every congregation were to be represented there.

The concept of intermediate levels provides for localization of the work of the church so that the group discussing the issue is appropriate to the nature of the questions. It also provides for decentralizing those services and functions that do not need to be handled on a denominational level.

On the other hand, intermediate levels provide a series of discussion points or “congregations of congregations” where there can be broad discussion of churchwide issues in a more effective way than is possible alone at the denominational level.

The Conference

Historically, conferences have served a very specific function providing a focal point for congregations who share their mutual interests. While variously interpreted, the role of conference has included authoritative direction in matters of doctrine and polity, guidance for the ordered life of the congregation, organization of cooperative programs of nurture and service, and responsibility. for validating the ordained ministry and the status of the congregation.

Over the years conference lines have proliferated as conference members moved into new areas for witness or colonization. New congregations have developed, sometimes quite far removed from the area of the conference, but the conference relationship and membership was maintained. Occasionally congregations were located in another conference area, resulting in considerable overlapping. Not infrequently a number of congregations in a new area of outreach represented several conferences, all of whom were far removed from that area.

The Plan recognizes the conference as a valid type of intermediate level organization. The present Mennonite Church is conference-oriented with the conference as the basic unit of organization. Any change must be implemented by action of the conferences. The conferences retain the right to continue or alter their status as desired.

Region

A significant new feature in the Plan is the concept of regional organization. With increased movement of responsibility toward the congregation, the role of the conference has often been lessened. On the other hand, while many conferences are less involved in traditional patterns or church authority, or are too remote from the congregation, or are too large to relate effectively, they are likewise limited in their resources for providing services and facilities in administration.

The concept of regional organization is proposed as an attempt to provide a new geographic delineation. Regional boundaries place all congregations in a given area in a new relationship enabling them to develop services and programs in a united way relevant to the area. This speaks to the problem of extended and overlapping conference lines and provides a new administrative base for regional office and programs. In effect, this symbolizes a decentralization of certain denominational functions, particularly those which are relevant to that regional area, such as mission strategy, congregational activity, etc.

Regional Assembly

The regional assembly meeting biennially represents a gathering of congregational representatives. This is an attempt to capture the congregation in a new effective decision-making body. Each congregation is authorized to send a pastor and an ordained person for the first 150 members plus an additional lay member for each additional 150 members. It is hoped that the rich and varied life of the brotherhood can be symbolized in the regional assembly membership, as lay members, youth, minority representatives, and women participate. Active bishops and area overseers will be ex officio members.

Regional assemblies will be encouraged to develop administrative facilities and programs, combining resources for localized administration. Other functions would include liaison with denominational agencies, participation in denominational decision-making and budget-planning, and fundraising for regional and denominational programs.

Each region will send delegates to the General Assembly and also elect or appoint a representative to the General Board and to each of four program boards: Missions, Education, Congregational Ministries, and Publication.

The relationship of the region to the conference will require further planning. Flexibility is provided for a varied pattern of relationship. In certain instances the conference may be replaced by the region; in others, conferences may wish to continue. This decision is made by the conference. In the event the regional assembly does not materialize, alternate provisions are made for a delegate group from that area to be sent to the General Assembly.

District

The shift in the role of conferences raises questions about some of the traditional symbols of leadership and authority. The Plan proposes the "District" as a new pattern representing a smaller conference-like organization. In some conferences, such as Virginia and Lancaster, the bishop district is a localized pattern of administration. In other conferences, particularly in the West, there are groups of congregations geographically separated, each of which might develop a limited amount of organization. A regional organization embracing several districts might be a possible alternative to the present conference pattern. The region provides the larger resources, program, and functional activities, while the district provides a more immediate focus of church leadership and authority.

General Assembly

It is proposed that the General Assembly succeed the General Conference as a denominational forum for discussion and administration of those issues and programs of churchwide significance. This will be a body of approximately 350 people meeting biennially alternating with the biennial regional assembly. This group will be responsible to give leadership to the work of the denomination and administer the denominational agencies.

General Board

Under the proposed structure the "General Board" would become the agency charged with the overall administration of church programs as directed by the General Assembly. The General Board would be small enough to function as an executive body, meeting as a committee of the whole, in which capacity it would direct the work of the General Secretary and his staff. The General Board will be responsible for directing all matters relating to coordination of inter-Board relationships and taking responsibility for recommending to the General Assembly budgets and denominational policies. The General Board is also responsible to arrange for fund-raising and to provide general services, including accounting, information, research, etc.

Board of Congregational Ministries

A proposed Board of Congregational Ministries would bring together functions currently provided under various committees of General Conference. This Board is designed to effect a greater integration of programs serving the needs and problems of the congregations. Thus, the denomination can focus more specifically on strengthening the congregation and helping it to become a more effective part of the denominational process.

Other Program Boards

The Board of Education, Board of Missions, Publication Board, and Mutual Aid Board will continue their programs without too much change from the present pattern. However, it should be noted that they would be responsible to the General Board and through the General Board to the General Assembly. Thus a new integrating factor is introduced into the relationship of these Boards which previously were independent. The goal of the proposal is the achievement of a coordinating relationship which will make the denominational program services more effective to the regions and the congregations.

It is believed that Boards of 40-60 members are too large to function effectively. Instead of a large Board meeting annually with a small executive committee carrying much of the administrative responsibility, the proposal calls for program boards of 12 members meeting regularly as a committee of the whole. The new proposal provides for five members elected by the General Assembly and two by the General Board. While the previous pattern provided for each conference to be represented, the new proposal is that each region appoints a member, making a total of 12.

Summary

This proposal has significant implication for the future of the brotherhood. It has no value unless it is Spirit-conceived and directed. In reality the Plan is no more effective than the people who are involved in it. It is not to be seen as a final document but rather one stage in an ongoing process.
33 Enter Voluntary Service

From Sept. 14-24, one of the largest orientation schools in recent years was held at Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. Thirty-three persons accepted and were commissioned for Voluntary Service assignments as follows:

First row: Jerry Fortner, Rock City, Ill., maintenance worker for two years at Froh Community Home, Sturgis, Mich.; Randy Noe, Eureka, Ill., child care worker for two years at Frontier Boys Village, Colorado Springs, Colo.; Glenn Jantzi, Elmlra, Ont., one year as orderly at St. Francis Hospital, Carlsbad, N.M.; Gary Knarr, Waterloo, Ont., one year as orderly at Maple Lawn Homes, Eureka, Ill.; Lester Miller, Kouts, Ind., orderly at Mennonite Home, La Junta, Colo., two years; and Donald Martin, Elmira, Ont., special assignment with the Cherchez-Viure group. (Publicity to be released — ed.)

Second row: Gary Leis, Wellesley, Ont., Cherchez-Viure; Arlene Erb, Wellesley, Ont., youth aide for one year at St. Francis Hospital, Carlsbad, N.M.; Paul Cressman, Kitchener, Ont., teacher's aide for one year with the Albuquerque, N.M., unit; Marian Brenner, Wooster, Ohio, one year as nurse aide at Emmanuel Hospital, Omaha, Neb.; Carol Sharp, Lachine, Mich., nurse aide at Virginia Home, Richmond, Va., for one year; Marcia Wolter, Calgary, Alta., assistant hostess for one year at International Guests House, Washington, D.C.

Also Lois Burkholder, Harrisonburg, Va., child care worker for one year with the Durham, N.C., unit; Shelagh Thorne, Calgary, Alta., one year as girls' club leader with the Surprise, Ariz., unit; Carol Niswander, Harbor Springs, Mich., assistant hostess for one year with the Kansas City, Mo., unit; Diane Cressman, Waterloo, Ont., licensed practical nurse for one year at St. Francis Hospital, Carlsbad, N.M.; Robert Brundage, South Bend, Ind., construction and community service worker for one year at Camp Rehoboam, St. Anne, Ill.; and Andrew McDowell, Unionville, Ont., Cherchez-Viure.

Third row: Marvin and Cheryl Roth, Colorado Springs, Colo., program directors for the Kansas City, Kan., unit for two years; Bruce and Sheryl Kooker, Harleysville, Pa., community service for two years at the Caldwell, Idaho, Farm Labor Camp; and John and Linda Stoll, Casselton, N.D., community service worker and unit hostess at Englewood, Chicago, for two years.

Fourth row: Sharon Snider, Elmira, Ont., Cherchez-Viure; Frances Gerber, Wellesley, Ont.; secretary for one year with the Kansas City, Mo., unit; Linda Albrecht, Sebewaing, Mich., registered nurse in Albonita, P.R., for 26 months; Melodie Miller, Blountstown, Fla., one year as nursery director with the Ary, Ky., unit; and Sharon Martin, Waterloo, Ont., Cherchez-Viure.

Fifth row: Rebecca Garber, Woodburn, Ore., child care worker for one year at Sunshine Children's Home, Maumee, Ohio; Martha Metzger, Elmira, Ont., Cherchez-Viure; Shirley Basinger, Wooster, Ohio, laundry worker for one year at Kansas City (Kan.) Children's Home; and Rebecca Lee, Honolulu, Hawaii, nurse aide at Virginia Home, Richmond, for one year.

The Oct. 12-22 orientation will host another large group. Currently 320 youth through senior adults are stationed in 53 different Voluntary Service locations in the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Puerto Rico under the auspices of Mennonite Board of Missions.

MCC Jordan Programs
Under Local Leadership

Though all North American and European Mennonite Central Committee workers have now left Jordan, 15 local Arabs and Palestinians working for MCC are doing their best to carry on the programs in the face of war in that country.

At latest report from Jordan, dated Sept. 14, the MCC kindergarten had opened and was in operation, with the express support of some of the Palestinian groups. Most other Jordanian schools had closed down as a result of sporadic fighting in the streets. The sewing center in Marka was in operation under the able leadership of one of the local teachers though some of the staff was unable to commute to work from Amman. Also under local guidance was the mother-child care center in Amman, though there has been no report from MCC workers in Amman since the heavy fighting broke out last week.

Material aid shipments for this fall are already on their way to Jordan. MCC is presently investigating the possibility of increased assistance through medical personnel and supplies to the suffering people caught in the crossfire of this internal strife. It is planned that MCC programs will continue in Jordan, in cooperation with the Jordanian Ministry of Social Affairs, assuming that in a reasonable period of time the situation will clear sufficiently to allow expatriate personnel to remain in Amman.

Urbane Peachey, MCC representative for the Middle East, is presently in Beirut, Lebanon. He is in close contact with the situation in Jordan, and will make recommendations as to MCC's involvement there.

Virgil and Louise Claassen, Kenneth and Willa Reddig, Lorraine Regehr, and Richard Yoder left Jordan for Crete on June 12 and 13, soon after the fighting began. Most other church-related organizations withdrew their expatriate personnel at about the same time. Margrit Schoumann remained in Amman working with the Palestinian Red Crescent and keeping MCC programs going until early September. She returned to her home in Switzerland on Sept. 11, having completed her term. Her latest reports from Amman were of "trying to continue the programs amid increasing tension and fighting in the city.'

Virgil Claassen, MCC director for Jordan, returned from Crete to Amman and then went to Beirut on Aug. 21 to meet Urbane Peachey and family who arrived to assume duties. Peachey and Claassen were prevented by the open fighting from going to Amman. Claassen returned to Akron on Sept. 9 after having extended his term to overlap with Peachey. He will be continuing with MCC at the North Newton Regional MCC Office in Kansas. Louise
Committee Plans for Mission '71

How does one go about planning an annual mission convention for the Mennonite Church? After Mission '69 what should one expect of Mission '70? After Mission '70 what should Mission '71 become?

These and other questions faced the Mission '71 program planning committee as it met at Eureka College, Eureka, Ill., on Sept. 14. James Detweiler, Manson, Iowa, chairs the committee, and Robert Yoder of Eureka, chairman of local arrangements, also met with the group during the morning session.

Other members of the group—some appointed by the Mennonite Board of Missions executive committee and others appointed by Illinois Conference or one of its subsidiary groups—were: Laura Conrad, Sterling, and Melvin Henderson, Hopkins Park, Ill.; Joseph Hertzler, Iowa City, Iowa; Ivan Kauffman, Hope Dale, and Mark Lehman, St. Anne, Ill.; Wallace Jantz, La Junta, Colo.; Beulah Kauffman, Elkhart, Ind.; Larry Miller, Goshen, Ind.; and John Valtierra, Chicago, Ill.; Boyd Nelson, secretary for Information Services, met with the committee as the Board staff person following through administratively on committee decisions.

Certain threads of concern emerged, although no decisions were reached finally on overarching purpose. One member was concerned that we not assemble to lambaste each other and then afterward go our separate ways. He also urged some kind of programming that would move beyond mere talk to some kind of positive action. Others wished for a mission meeting which would draw the Mennonite Church together and build Christian unity with emphasis given to Christian hope that encourages concern and continued witness in spite of endless indifference and frustration. Another asked whether the spirit of Convention '70 at Lake Junaluska should be continued.

The group did agree that Mission '71 should: provide the catalyst for continued similar meetings on other levels of church life; provide a base of Bible study and prayer; provide practical experience and sold Christian input; include a message growing out of 65 years of missions in the Mennonite Church; and tie together the Christian faith and experiences of hope, love, reconciliation, and forgiveness.

The Mission '71 program planning committee agreed to meet again on Nov. 11. Persons in the brotherhood who would like to offer program suggestions are encouraged to send them to James Detweiler, chair- man, Box 108, Manson, Iowa 50563, or to Boyd Nelson, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514. Mission '71 is being held at Eureka College, July 1 to 6, 1971.

MDS Continues

Work in Texas

On Aug. 3, 1970, Hurricane Celia hit land just north of Corpus Christi, Tex., with a wind velocity of 160-180 miles per hour. Celia produced tidal waves 14 feet high and dumped eight inches of rain in some areas. Thirty-two deaths and material damage of over half a billion dollars were the result.

Marvin Hostetler, McPherson, Kan., MDS Region III director, and Henry Z. Friesen, Meade, Kan., were first to investigate the area for MDS. The following week 27 volunteers from Oklahoma and Kansas came to assist in the cleanup. Other volunteers from Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, and Ontario have participated. Headquarters for the MDS volunteers is in the Prince of Peace Mennonite Church, Corpus Christi, Tex. Volunteers are repairing the Mennonite church at Mathis. General repair work is being done in Robstown and Rockport. At Corpus Christi a temporary day care center is being erected and repair work is being done on the Mennonite church.

Leadership is presently being provided by Ralph King, on loan from the Voluntary Service Section of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, and by Paul Conrad, pastor of the Prince of Peace Mennonite Church. King is in charge of the entire work at Robstown, as well as handling the finances and designating volunteers to various work sites. Conrad directs the work at Corpus Christi, purchases food, prepares breakfast, and leads in morning devotions. Jim Miller, Edinburg, Tex., served as foreman in the initial stages of the program. Atanacio Paez, pastor of the Calvary Mennonite Church at Mathis, directs the work there.

Some 35,000 families from seven surrounding counties have registered with the Red Cross for material assistance. The Red Cross, for the first time, is assisting families in securing Small Business Administration loans.

At this point it seems that all except the hard-core cases will be cared for by the Red Cross by late October, at which time MDS should also be drawing its work to a close. At the meantime MDS hopes to maintain a 20-30 man working force in the area.

Volunteers will need to take with them towels and soap, a pillow, if needed, and a sleeping bag to use as a mattress on a canvas cot.

Each worker should also take along a hammer, handsaw, and ruler. Each carload should have a competent carpenter foreman, estimator, an electric drill, electric saw, and a power cord.

Carloads of volunteers should clear, before leaving, with Delmar Stahl, Akron, Pa., telephone (717) 859-1151, or after hours (717) 859-2183. Upon arrival in Corpus Christi, Tex., proceed to the Prince of Peace Mennonite Church, 1802 Horne Road. Telephone number of Prince of Peace Mennonite Church is (512) 853-8534. Paul Conrad, pastor, has a private phone at (512) 853-7931.

Choraleers Visit Guatemala

Arriving at Guatemala’s International Airport “La Aurora” on Mon., Aug. 31, was Arnold Mosher and his wife with nine lively young people from Lancaster Mennonite School known as the Choraleers.

When we first heard that Arnold was bringing “some typical Mennonite young people,” we weren’t sure whether we should invite them to come or not. For we didn’t know the young people, and the national brethren here frowned on hippies, or anything that looks even “a little bit" that way. Our fear was that anything they would sing, regardless of the message, would fall on questioning ears.

But, we changed our minds! These nine singers gave a program that Monday evening that blessed everyone in that little national church. Their spirit and their love for Christ was communicated through the songs they sang and the joy they expressed in their faces. The nationals and the workers here were thrilled to have had the privilege of hearing this group sing and to worship together with them.

This type of visit is needed and appreciated, for it is a necessary inspiration to our national brethren, as well as to the missionaries.

EMHS to Hold Homecoming

Homecoming for Eastern Mennonite High School alumni is October 17, 18. Activities include the presentation of David, the Shepherd Boy by Root and Butterworth, an alumni reception, a worship service, and several class reunions.

David, the Shepherd Boy will be presented as a musical drama in EMC Auditorium Sat., Oct. 17, 7:30 p.m. Soloists include David Seitz as David, Nathan Showalter as Samuel, and David Augsburger as Saul. Lloyd Kauffman will sing the part of Jonathan, and Sylvia Brunk, EMHS senior, will portray the role of Abigail. School groups will sing the mass chorus selections. Marvin L. Miller, music instructor, is director of the drama.

Following the program Saturday evening, there will be a reception for all alumni.

Harold Buckwalter, Norfolk, Va., will speak in the worship service Sunday morning at ten o’clock. Buckwalter has been associated with the Church at Sea program for the past several years.

Members of the classes of 1960 and 1965 will meet for reunions.

Daryl and Doris Alwine, Johnstown, Pa., left Sept. 14 for Kabul, Afghanistan, after two weeks of orientation at Mennonite Central Committee’s headquarters. The Alwines are being loaned by MCC to the National Organization for Orthopaedic Rehabilitation (NOOR) of the International Afghan Mission, for a three-year term of service. They are the first MCC personnel to enter service in Afghanistan.

The Homebuilders’ (Lancaster, Pa., area) Fall Meeting will be held at the Weaverland Mennonite Church, 7:00 p.m., Oct. 8, 1970. Mrs. Richard C. Detweiler, Souderton, Pa., will speak on the subject, “Is Christ at Home in My Heart?”

Applications are being received for the 1970-71 terms of the Conservative Mennonite Bible School and Institute, Rosedale, Ohio. The dates are: Bible Institute (NOOR), Nov. 9—Dec. 18, 1970; Second Term, Jan. 4—Feb. 12, 1971; Third Term, Feb. 15—Mar. 26, 1971; Bible School, Jan. 4—Feb. 12, 1971.

For further information contact Philip D. Shetler, R. 1, Irwin, Ohio 43029. Tel.: 614 857 2275.

Noah S. Kolb was ordained to the ministry for the Pottstown congregation on Sept. 20. Elmer G. Kolb was the officiating bishop assisted by John E. Lapp. His address is: 477 N. Charlotte St., Pottstown, Pa. 19464. Tel.: 215 323-1682.

Calvin Borntreger was ordained bishop for the Townline Conservative Mennonite Church on Aug. 2. Eli D. Miller was the officiating bishop assisted by Morris Swartzentruber and Clarence A. Yoder.

David J. Graber was ordained bishop and John H. Swartzentruber was ordained minister at the Berea Church, Montgomery, Ind., Sept. 13. Tobias Slabaugh officiated and the sermon was given by William R. Miller.

Thirty-seven people met on Tuesday evening, Sept. 15, at the Sunnyslope Mennonite Church, Phoenix, Ariz., to discuss retirement facilities. Six Mennonite congregations, one neighboring congregation, and community persons were represented. Action was taken to proceed with the study, recommending that each interested congregation appoint three representatives to serve on a planning committee. The first meeting of this committee was set for Oct. 1. Individuals interested in keeping in touch with the progress of this program are invited to send name and address to Leland Bachman, 9844 N. Seventh Place, Phoenix, Ariz. 85020.

Financial Report of General Conference

Fourteen Months of the Biennium — July 1, 1969, to August 31, 1970

Approved budget for this period

$163,300

Receipts

137,982

Disbursements

142,654

Money borrowed

19,497

Short of budget

25,318

Expenditures beyond receipts

During the first 2 1/2 months of the second year of the biennium, receipts were $41,518. This was a great improvement in receipts which came in response to the special appeal made to the churches. A continuation of substantial contributions is necessary to make it possible to carry present programs and pay the indebtedness. Programs are being held to a minimum. More cutback in program could impoverish us in the years ahead. Our times call us to our most diligent efforts and a more aggressive leadership. Can we depend upon your partnership?

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

I want to express my deep appreciation for the reprint from Eternity magazine, “What the Well-Dressed Woman Isn’t Wearing” (Sept. 8). The author and illustrator, very early on it is clear that their questions and answers in a masterful way all the objections and arguments of those women who have been captivated by the goddess of fashion and are in- sistently demanding the thoughtless, wrong with their following the styles that display the feminine charms. This article should be made available in tract form for wider distribution.

The testimony which the mennonite Church owns for the modern dresser. Of its girls and women is rapidly becoming a thing of the past as the women of the church seem to be making a desperate attempt to throw off all shackles of separation. In days past the mennonite Church kept her women modestly dressed by means of rules and regulations. Now that the rules are being eased, changed, or ignored, it has become evident that many dressed modestly because of the rules and not out of conviction to exemplify a holy life before the world.

Unfortunately too much of the church has not learned the lesson that our lives cannot be controlled only by the gracious presence of an indwelling person, the Lord Jesus Christ. “The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life” (2 Cor. 3:6). Nothing will promote modest dressing on the part of our sisters like a holy awareness that the body of a Christian is the dwelling place of God’s Holy Spirit. Where that is taught and realized there will be a real desire on the part of our sisters to dress in a way that the inner beauty of the Spirit is not obscured or marred by a vain and provocative display of flesh-sheathed or otherwise exposed.

There is a statement in the letter of Gerald E. Shenk (Sept. 1) which disturbs me. It is this: “I submit that if Brother Lehman thinks being a good American citizen is synonymous with being a good Christian citizen as his letter infers, then he is not rightfully here to his Mennonite heritage.” I think Shenk intends to make a point that being a “good American citizen means wearing the stamp: approval of everything the U.S. government does whether just and morally right or not.” I cannot but say, and I do not think President Nixon would expect that any one else would either. I believe that a good American citizen can be in the fullest sense be that only if he is a Christian. He is not a good American citizen unless he is cognizant of the wrongs and injustices of his government and seeks to correct them through appropriate channels. Loving his country he will seek to have it deal justly with other countries. Maurice W. Lands, Lancaster, Pa.

As busy as I am I must take time out to comment on the article, “What the Well-Dressed Woman Isn’t Wearing,” by Kerry Ellick in your Sept. 8 issue.

The article truly makes the point, and it does it with a fresh approach. We need more like it. I wholeheartedly agree that the miniskirt has no place in the wardrobe of a Christian. I find it shocking to see girls in their mid and late teens, standing up on the church platform on special program days, who are not dressed decently. For the Christian fellowship, let alone appear front and center. I wonder if they know what they are doing, and I try to convince myself that they don’t. But I think it is the impression their mothers don’t know. And, I find it totally impossible to believe that their fathers are ignorant of the facts of life. Christians? — Edwin Bullers, Mayport, Pa.

Also surviving are 3 daughters (Ethel, Kathryn — Mrs. Roy Metzler, and Mary — Mrs. John Huber), one son (Ira), 8 grand- children, and one brother (Jason). He was a member of the Tuttle Avenue Church. Funeral services were held at the Hawkins Funeral Home, Sarasota, Fla., Sept. 7, with H. Michael Shenk officiating, and graveside services at the Strasburg (Pa.) Mennonite Cemetery, Sept. 10, with Clayton Keenei officiating; interment in the Strasburg Mennonite Cemetery.

Mullett, Harvey, son of William and Elizabeth (Miller) Mullett, was born at Walnut Creek, Ohio, June 19, 1887; died at the Union Hospital, Dover, Ohio, Sept. 14, 1970; aged 83 y. 2 m. 26 d. On Jan. 9, 1912, he was married to Prudence Gerber, who died July 4, 1931. On Apr. 14, 1938, he was married to Katie Troyer Mast, who survives. Also surviving are 2 daughters (Mrs. Arlene Philiippi and Ruth — Mrs. Robert Immler), one son (Archie), one stepson (Richard Mast), 9 grandchildren, 7 great-grandchildren, one brother (Alvin), and one sister (Mrs. Amanda Yoder). He was preceded in death by 2 sons, one sister, and 2 brothers. He was a member of the Walnut Creek Church, where funeral services were held Sept. 17, with Paul R. Miller officiating, assisted by Paul Hummel; interment in the church cemetery.

Richter, Randall Lynn, son of Roger and Florence (Byler) Richter, was born at Upland, Calif., Apr. 4, 1966; died at the San Antonio Community Hospital, Aug. 31, 1970; aged 4 y. 4 m. 27 d. Surviving in addition to his parents are one brother (Jerrill), paternal grandparents, and maternal grandmother. Funeral services were held at the Seventh Street Church, Upland, Calif., Sept. 7, with Jesse T. Byler, Charles Neff, Theron Welsy, and Donald Yoder officiating, interment in the Bellevue Cemetery, Ontario, Calif.

Roesch, Norma Lee, daughter of Glen and Edna (Brenninger) Apple, was born near Mark Center, Ohio, July 25, 1922; died after 14 years of illness, July 7, 1970, aged 43 y. 2 d. On Jan. 25, 1941, she was married to Delmar Roesch, who survives. Also surviving are 3 sons (Gene, Norman, and Robert), 5 grandchildren, her father, 3 brothers (Richard, Howard, and Morris), and 3 sisters (Mrs. Neva Bok, Mrs. Fay Kam- meyer, and Dorothy Helen). She was preceded in death by her mother and one sister. She was a member of the Pine Grove Church near Stryker, Ohio, where funeral services were held July 11, with D. Wyse Graber officiating, assisted by Walter Stuckey.

It was settled by Palatinate and Rhineeland Mennonites who had arrived on the ship Concord eight days earlier. A log meetinghouse built in 1708 was replaced by the present meetinghouse in 1770, two centuries ago this year. In 1982 the Germantown Church was restored to its Colonial simplicity. Commemorative services will be held on Sunday, Oct. 11, 1970.

Reformation Day—Every Day

By Nelson E. Kauffmann

Once a year the church year calendar designated a day as Reformation Sunday. There is no event in church history, unless it was the Crusades of half a century earlier, that so profoundly influenced the development of Christianity as did the Reformation in the sixteenth century. It is perfectly proper to frequently remember this event with special emphasis.

The Need for Reformation

The Roman Catholic Church in Western Europe, and the Greek Catholic Church in Eastern Europe were united with the governments and controlled all religious life for almost 1,000 years. Decadence, depravity, corruption, and oppression were everywhere. To change the concepts of Christianity and church required men of great heroism and conviction. Such were Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, Conrad Grebel, Menno Simons, and many others.

The church, while a divine institution is also human. It tends to become bound by tradition of the past, and dead. Necessary changes are always feared and make people feel insecure. If no changes emerge from developing new life, the church becomes a lifeless system. So it was in the years 1492-1536.

New worlds were discovered. New learning developed. The state church remained spiritually dead, but was intolerant toward dissenters. The church leaders were unspeakably corrupt. The peasants were enslaved and oppressed.

How Reformation Came

In 1517 Martin Luther of Wittenberg, Germany, challenged the authority of the powerful pope of Rome with ninety-five statements which he tacked on the community bulletin board, the door of the city church. When the pope of Rome sent him a statement of excommunication he merely tossed it into the fire and further defied his authority. He taught 1) the absolute authority of the Scriptures, 2) the all-sufficiency of Christ to save by grace through faith, and 3) that God was concerned with persons as individuals.

By 1525 Ulrich Zwingli was leading a reformation in Zurich, Switzerland, and John Calvin in Geneva. The Anabaptists were refusing to do less than use the Scriptures as their guide and so rejected the authority of the state in matters of faith. There followed great persecution of the Anabaptists by the other reformers as well as by Catholics. A peasants war broke out in Germany and all of Europe was in a state of revolution. Then there followed bitter bloody religious wars between Catholics and Protestants. Religious liberty and freedom of religion finally became accepted principles several centuries later.

What Reformation Means for Us

Our Mennonite forefathers rejected infant baptism by which means the state-controlled church, whether Catholic, Lutheran, or Reformed, made sure every person was in the church. Anabaptists, who later were called Mennonites because Menno Simons was the outstanding leader, accepted only the baptism of believers. They recognized the church as a brotherhood, and rejected the use of force and use of weapons against people.

Today we are a believers' church, professing love and peace toward all men. We believe in Christ as Lord of all of life. We continue to teach the religious liberty and freedom of conscience. The Anabaptist-Mennonite concept of Christian living has had a profound influence on all present-day Christianity.

The Reformation Must Continue

While the prophet quotes God as saying, "I am the Lord, I change not" (Mal. 3:6), and Hebrews says, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever" (Heb. 13:8), God did put us into a world of change. He made us persons who change by the very passing of time. Our great temptation as churches is to become fixed in the program and procedures of a past era. We then no longer are relevant to our time and society.

The world of men moves on. It makes new discoveries. Life patterns change. The church is sent by the changeless God into a changing world. A stagnant church cannot reach a world in flux. Therefore re-formation is necessary.

We need teaching programs to cause people to know the Scriptures. But the methods cannot be those of one hundred, or fifty, or even of ten years ago. The language of a country changes. The Bible must be translated into the thought patterns of today to reach the man of today.

The methods of evangelism change. The revival meeting, a week of evening services, no longer meets the need because people work on shifts. The ten to twelve time for Sunday worship met the need of farmers in generations past. We now must have a program for people who go away over weekends. New forms and patterns of life will develop with new technology. Man's needs are the same. The re-formation must develop new methods to bring God's message to man to meet his needs.

Our methods of communicating God's message must change as new techniques of communication develop in the world. We struggle as did the reformers of the sixteenth century, with the meaning of new truth from the old Book.

Reformation Is Threatening

All change has threats to some part of the status quo. The move from preaching in German to preaching in English threatened many people in the past. It does some yet today. Some fear, and others are sure, that if we lose the German, or Spanish, or Norwegian, or ?, we will also lose our faith.

The change from no notes to notes in our songbooks was threatening. The change from the King James Version will threaten many people. It is well to remember that for sixteen centuries the church did not have a King James Version and yet survived. The Bible was not written in English, the King James English, or any other. Nor was it first written in German.

We do not like changes in our Sunday school program, or the materials, yet all the other teaching techniques our society uses are changing to adapt to the needs of the present day. The use of audiovisuals is here to stay, for some time at least. The children become young people and they threaten the parents. The young people seldom do things the way their parents did. But how often church members reject new truth and new methods as well as the persons who present it! New art and new music always threaten some people.

True, there is danger in change. New truth must be tested so we do not fall into error. We should admit that God being infinite, is greater than any one of us, or all of us together, can comprehend. We have not yet discovered all there is to know about any aspect of God's truth, in His Word, in nature, in art, or in music.

Secure in Reformation

Our relationship to Christ needs to be a growing experience. The younger should learn from older persons, but older persons can learn from the younger. Young thirty-year-old Jesus of Nazareth had a lot to teach sixty-year-old Rabbis, but it threatened them. Young Paul was also a threat, so much so that he was rejected by the early Jerusalem church. We can prepare ourselves for change by maintaining a growing experience with Christ. We can all be subject to one another. 1 Peter 5:5. Then we will not fear though the earth be removed. Psalm 46. We expect the reformation to continue to keep the church effective in the current world, yet as faithful to Christ and to His Word as the church of any generation in the past.

We need to pray Paul's prayers for greater knowledge as he prayed in Ephesians 1:15-23; 3:14-21; Philippians 1:9-11; Colossians 1:9-17. A growing knowledge cannot but bring spiritual growth and maturity. In maturity there is less fear of new truth that requires new obedience. That truth which lies beyond us today is far greater than that we have so far acquired and understood. To know one day, as we are known, will bring greater changes than any we have so far experienced, yet with that change into His likeness there will be no fear or sense of insecurity.

On the Absurdity of War

We fortify
And secure our nation
To bring peace.

We shout
And curse at each other
To bring peace.

We fight
And kill our brothers
To bring peace.

We bomb
And napalm children
To bring peace.

Can bad
Produce good?

Can hate
Make love?

Can death
Create life?

Can war
Bring peace?

Apathy Is Dead

How quickly the mood of a nation changes! When it does the context for congregational and denominational mission changes. That is why it is important to sense the mood of the times.

Only a few years ago one of the dominant moods was apathy. The country ran rampant with little Eichmanns, men who did what they were told even when they knew it was wrong; men who took little responsibility for anything; men who could hardly be persuaded to lift a finger to dial the police when someone was being murdered in the street below their window because they did not care to get involved.

But there is a discernible shift in the mood of the times at the beginning of the seventies. I think we have witnessed the death of apathy as a dominant national motif. There is grave concern about pollution, the war, the control of hijacking desperadoes, and incendiary revolutionaries. There is concern about poverty, hunger, population, and the increasing dehumanization of man. All this concern is a hopeful sign. Apathy is being conquered by concern. And concern is after all the beginning of action.

Related to the new mood of concern is a second awakening. People are less confident that they can solve these massive problems alone. In fact they are well aware that they cannot. So we are also seeing the end of another era, an era of rugged, roughshod individualism. There are no longer great heroic giants, neither in the world nor in church, who can be called upon to solve our problems for us. People are beginning to see that many shoulders must be put to the wheel if the wagon is to be moved out of the mire. Things can be accomplished when many work at the task together, things that no individual could hope to accomplish alone.

It can be seen immediately that if these are proper assessments of the mood of our times, that the death of apathy is being followed by a new concern, that confidence in the success of individualism is being replaced by an awareness that "teamness" is better, then the church has a new challenge.

The church, because it is people, does not escape the mood of the times in which it lives. So the questions are, Will the church with its new concern be concerned about the right things? And, can the church finally shrug off the kind of unhealthy individualism that has plagued it in the past? Can the church begin anew to do things together? If ever there was a time for Christian brotherhood to come into its own, this is that time.

"Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you" (Jn. 14:27).

More than six hundred years ago the great poet Dante stood before the doors of a monastery. Three times the monks asked him what he sought. At last the weary man said, "I seek peace."

So the quest for spiritual peace is as old as man. Men today seek it as surely as in the distant past. Yet one thing is true. Peace is not the result of favorable circumstances. True peace comes only when Christ comes and we receive His peace.

As shock absorbers and springs built into a car do not remove the stones from the rough highways, neither does Christ within remove from our lives the difficulties and disappointments. But Christ within, and His peace within, enables us to travel life's hard roads with inner peace, assurance, and joy.

So Paul and Silas, with backs bleeding in prison, could be perfectly at peace because Christ was with them. This enabled them to sing songs in the dark of the dungeon and at midnight. The sorrows of the saints are no less severe than the sorrows of the sinners. But the saint is kept in perfect peace because he nests in the bosom of Christ's peace and love.

To Trust

Whirling planets: Venus, Mars,
Solar systems, glittering stars,
The tiniest atoms of the earth —
Each one holds for Thee its worth.

The Milky Way, the galaxies,
The tiny bud, the birds and bees,
The farthest star, the tender flower—
All are guarded by Thy power.

Mighty Master, dare we doubt,
When evidence exists about
Thy love and care for us?—
Help us as the flow'rs to trust.

Help us always loyal be,
With wills orbited in Thee
To do our routine tasks each day —
To live, and serve, and walk Thy way.

What Does $35 Do?

In order for any operation to move with efficiency and effectiveness there must be careful planning and follow-through. Few realize the careful planning which goes into the work of the church. Since Boards and agencies of the church are so dependent upon the church for funds and personnel many factors must be kept in mind in all planning. This is why the brotherhood is asked to share through its representatives on Boards of the church.

Take the Mission Board as an example. Contributions needed for the General Mission Board were carefully reviewed at Mission '70. After much discussion on past experience and the need to move ahead the Board approved an asking of $35 per member beginning October 1, 1970. This should be in your church budgets.

Sometimes congregations and conferences forget the importance of forwarding funds to the Mission Board and other church agencies promptly. Funds forwarded promptly save interest on loans to meet current operational costs.

What does $35 per member do? Notice the Mission Board ad on page 858. Call attention to it in your church bulletin. If you are a pastor or teacher take some time to review it with your group. This captures in capsule form what your money is used for. Why not use this information in your personal or congregational prayer concern? An informed people will be an interested people. And an interested people will be a contributing people. — D.

“Mark Those Who Cause Divisions”

Paul in his last loving appeal to the Romans tells them to mark those who cause divisions and to avoid them. He writes, “Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple” (Rom. 16:17, 18).

Paul picks out two characteristics of men who hurt the church and hinder Christian fellowship. First, these men cause divisions among brethren. Anyone who does anything which disturbs the peace and love of the church is certainly not doing the work of God or the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit brings brethren together. Those who divide have to answer before God. Always! There is no Scripture which sanctions division between brethren. All the Scriptures which call us to “come out from among them” are calls to come out from adulteries, murders, unbelievers, and such like.

Second, such men, Paul says, put hindrances in the way of others. They make it harder for others to be Christians. They make rules which the Scripture says nothing about and without consultation of the body of believers. The man who dilutes or emasculates the Christian faith he professes to promote will hear his own punishment. And Jesus points out that punishment will be severe for the one who causes one of His little ones to stumble.

There are at least two different kinds of persons who promote divisions. The one we are quick to think about is the kind who pretends to serve Christ but is actually destroying faith by preaching wrong doctrine. Such preaches an adulterated doctrine.

A second kind of divisive person is the one who, in spite of all his pious words, outspoken orthodoxy, and fighting for the faith, sows discord and division wherever he moves. He pretends to stand for the doctrine but denies the doctrine by his attitude toward others and his opposition to others. By the facade of great swelling speeches and pious words on the faith he deceives the hearts of the simple while all the time seeking, as Paul says, to serve his “own belly.” That is, he seeks his own ego and following.

So Paul says quite simply, “Mark those who cause divisions.” The Christian is one whose utter sincerity must be beyond all question and all doubt. And when we see those who cause divisiveness in the flock we are called to take special heed because “such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly.” — D.

Battle of Bumper Stickers

One of the bumper stickers which is prominent today is “America—love it or leave it.” A few days ago I saw a similar sticker which said “Vietnam—love it or leave it.” So the battle of the bumper stickers goes on.

The slogan “America—love it or leave it” is supposed to say that anyone who criticizes our country is unpatriotic, a traitor, and ought to leave its shores. It says that if we are not for all our country does, right or wrong, we deserve to be deported. It is a call for all to cry “peace, peace,” even when there is no peace. It is a cry for good news rather than a recognition of bad news. But even the Bible has considerable bad news. So also things such as accidents, wrong decisions, and war are bad news. And it is fatal to bury our heads in the sand.

Love may be known best by its willingness to point out error and in its efforts to change a bad situation. In other words where is the sticker which says, “America—love it and change it”? The Christian does love his country enough to want to make it better. This involves a careful and critical concern when it does wrong. Also it includes a creative response in seeking to make it better. — D.

The Danger of Institutionalism

By Conrad G. Brunk

"Then Jesus was approached by a group of Pharisees and lawyers from Jerusalem, with the question: 'Why do your disciples break the ancient tradition? They do not wash their hands before meals.' He answered them: 'And what of you? Why do you break God's commandment in the interest of your tradition? For God said, 'Honour your father and mother,' and, 'The man who curses his father or mother must suffer death.' But you say, 'If a man says to his father or mother, 'Anything of mine which might have been used for your benefit is set apart for God,' then he must not honour his father or his mother.' You have made God's law null and void out of respect for your tradition. What hypocrisy! Isaiah was right when he prophesied about you: 'This people pays me lip-service, but their heart is far from me; their worship of me is in vain, for they teach as doctrines the commandments of men.'" (Mt. 15:1-9).

Matthew here records the incident of Jesus in another confrontation with the religious establishment of His day, represented by the Pharisees and religious lawyers. They quiz Jesus on the relationship of God's will and law to religious tradition. "Why do your disciples break the tradition?" they ask. Jesus met this question with one of His own: "Why do you . . . [make] God's law null and void out of respect for your tradition? . . . Isaiah was right . . . about you [your religion is mere lip-service, for you have made your tradition higher than God's commandment]."

The Danger

Jesus was certainly not castigating all respect for tradition with these statements — for notice that the commandment He uses for an example against the Pharisees is, "Honour your father and mother," a commandment to respect tradition. His point is much more profound than this. Jesus is pointing out a danger which is present in all tradition, and that is the danger that respect for tradition overshadow and obscure the will of God for His people.

Jesus sees here a problem that seems to plague all institutions, whether they are religious, political, or social institutions. Any group of people that band together for a purpose, guided by a vision or ideal, tend to lose sight of that original vision and become institutionalized. We have seen this happen time and again in our history — an organization explodes into being, united by the fervor and dedication of its members. It registers a profound impact upon its society and rallies yet more members to its cause.

But then as time moves on, the organization seems to lose its power, not only in its society, but even among its own members. The original vitality turns into strained efforts, and the former commitment of the members turns into a plodding routine.

Some people have suggested that every organization is destined to become a mere institution, and finally to die. Every institution seems to have the seeds of its own death present in it. It is said that most organizations lose the vitality and power that founded them after the first ten days, and none are able to preserve this power any longer than the first generation; for enthusiasm cannot be passed from one generation to the next.

History can lend support for this. For example, the Soviet Union is a country that grew out of the revolutionary fervor of Marxist communism. "We are a revolutionary government," the Russians are fond of saying to the world. Yet, since the second World War Soviet Russia has become one of the most antirevolutionary establishments of our day. It has put down revolutions in Hungary, Poland, and more recently in Czechoslovakia, and thus seems to be denying the very principles upon which it was founded, and to which it still pays lip-service.

A recent CBS television poll illustrated graphically the fact that many American people have lost sight of the ideals which gave birth to the American Revolution and are the foundation of the U.S. Constitution. Thousands of people who voiced their patriotic sentiments the loudest, reflected in their answers to certain questions that they no longer agreed with a majority of the amendments in the Bill of Rights.

Thus, the values which they honor with their lips are no longer understood by them, and are certainly not motivating factors in their lives. Many other examples could be given of institutions which were founded for one purpose, but now find themselves far from those purposes.

What are the causes of this kind of demise of institutions? Certainly there are many factors which a social scientist and others could point to, but I wish to point out a few which I think are crucial.

Self-Preservation

The temptation which faces every organization is to become interested in itself and in its own preservation, rather than in the propagation of its ideals and the achievement of its original goals. An organization tends to take on a defensive posture and lose sight of the aggressiveness which gave it its birth. The internal machinery of the institution becomes more important to its members than the purposes of the organization, and the ideals and values which once instilled a fire and a commitment into the members are obscured.

The second generation arrives on the scene, and all it can see is the machinery — the committees and the great problems that arise in keeping the machinery running smoothly. To put it simply: the spirit and vision of a group become institutionalized — they become an "establishment"; and all that the second generation can see is the "establishment" — the spirit and vision are lost. The preservation of the institution becomes the highest value for its members.

The unfortunate consequence of all this is that the driving force which motivated the founders of the organization is lost. Their ideals and their values no longer ignite the hearts of the second generation. They become mere meaningless forms. These principles not only lose their power among the members, but they also lose their effectiveness in the surrounding society.

This is what is happening in our own country today. The younger generation is no longer stirred by the waving flag, patriotic speeches, and the singing of the national anthem. The meaning of these symbols has been lost sight of by the American people. "Democracy," "freedom," and "equality" are words that we honor, but no longer understand. The "American Revolution" has been lost sight of by the American people who find themselves fighting on the side of dictatorships all over the world. The youth of the nation are beginning to see the inconsistency between our principles and our actions.

Religious institutions are not immune to this kind of death. Is this not precisely the issue to which Jesus was referring in the confrontation with the Pharisees? "You have made God's law null and void out of respect for your tradition," He told them. "This people pays me lip-service, but their heart is far from me . . . their worship of me is in vain." The judgment which Jesus was bringing against the Jewish religious establishment was not against their tradition as such, for He saw Himself as a fulfillment of the Jewish tradition.

Rather, His judgment was against a tradition which had lost sight of its mission in the world; which had made its central concern the preservation of the tradition rather than the commandments of God which had been the source of Jewish tradition. Jewish religion had so lost sight of its messianic vision, that it could not recognize its Messiah who stood in its midst. Jewish religion had not kept up with its times. Along with many other institutions, it had become egocentric.

Institutional Paralysis

Christianity too has fallen prey to the same sort of institutional paralysis and again and again it has to be shocked into reformation and revival. The medieval Roman Church had lost its sense of purpose, and its touch with the needs of the world around it. The Reformation was not so much a rejection of the tradition of the Roman Church as it was a rejuvenating of the values implicit in that tradition; values which had become stale and stagnant — lost in the bureaucracy of the state-church institution.

The Reformation was a rekindling of the initial fire which burned in the hearts of the early Christians before Christianity became an established routine. The Reformation recaptured the ideals of the New Testament church and brought them into gear with the needs of the people. In the Reformation, Christianity again became a lively option.

Now in the latter part of the twentieth century, we are witnessing what many people are calling the "rise of the post-Christian era." The Christian values and ideals no longer speak to the secular man, it is said. And even Christians themselves are in large part apathetic, merely following the forms of Christian faith and practice, without experiencing its power and the commitment to its purposes.

More specifically, the Mennonite Church is swiftly losing its identity in the world. Every day it becomes more difficult to distinguish a Mennonite from the general populace of our country, as we have adopted more and more the behavior patterns of our culture. The forms which are symbolic of our tradition are largely being rejected by the youth who no longer find them meaningful. The spirit and fervor of the Anabaptist movement is certainly not with us as it was in the sixteenth century.
Speak Only to Ourselves

Has Christendom become an institution—as "establishment" in our time? Is the Mennonite Church losing its witness in the world because its symbols and its values have lost their motivating power among its own people? Have we also fallen victim to the specter that haunts all institutions? Have we concentrated our efforts and attention on the preservation of the "forms" of Mennonitism and relinquished our sense of mission—our real "reason for being" in the world? Have we become so defensive that we have no longer anything to offer our youth, to say nothing of our fel lowmen? Have we communicated to our people the "forms of godliness" while denying the power thereof?

The final death of an institution occurs when it attempts to preserve itself and its traditional forms while the world moves on beyond it, and the institution begins speaking only to itself rather than to the concerns of the world. The effective institution is only that one which keeps its ideals and values alive by constantly exposing them to the needs of the world and adapting them to those needs. The church is not immune from this principle. It, too, must constantly reinterpret and rejuvenate its fundamental principles so that they stay abreast of the world. History never stops or waits for static principles or values. It always moves, and values and principles must keep apace if they are to retain their power in history.

The Power of Insecurity

By Mary Hess

In our fast-changing American society today there lurks a deep sense of insecurity. The future is unsure and the present is anxious. So to bridge this widening tension in our lives we are in danger of latching on to the flimsy trappings provided by a competitive capitalism that we find surrounding us.

Certainly this can be documented by the statistics of increasing suicides, mental hospital patients, and early deaths from overtaxed hearts. The advertising media is full of temporary remedies for tension, sleeplessness, exhaustion—pills to keep us awake and pep us up, and pills to put us to sleep.

The Christian is not immune to becoming a victim of these quick escapes any more than anyone else, notwithstanding the great number and variety of promises Jesus has given us and the many evidences around us that His Word is never failing.

Safe Investments

We feel that we need a substantial bank account of affluent proportions and a padding of safe investments. One woman told me that her husband was raised in poverty and insecurity and that they decided they were going to spend their lives making themselves financially secure for their old age. I knew them when they were past 50 and they were, indeed, financially secure, but their lives were a misery, their marriage breaking up. They had reached their goal and found out too late that they were just as anxious with money as they had been without it.

Measuring by current standards this couple had the elements of security. They are not professing Christians, but many of us as Christians are following that same pattern. We may not express it in the same way, or even think it, but our need for this kind of security seems to be just as great. It's in the air and, like it or not, we are subject to it.

Jesus never promised us an affluent, or even a solvent, bank account. He knew the pitfalls and our innate weaknesses. He said, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Possessions

The second area in which we try to beat this insecurity is by possession of things and property. We must have a home that is no less than any other on the block or in the community, a two-car garage that houses a new car at least every two years, a split-level house, wall-to-wall carpeting from the porch to the bathroom stool, a freezer packed with food.

To make this security secure all must be covered by adequate insurance for any eventuality from tornadoes to a guest or salesman breaking a bone on our property. Again the pressure is steadily on the Christian to find his security here; but contrary to the social and economic mores that we are continuously exposed to, the Christian's security lies in the direct opposite of these things.

Jesus said, "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" And again, "Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." In other words He will take care of us if we forget ourselves and our needs and trust Him.

The third area in which we are very protective of our own personal security is in our relationship to the "establishment," a much flaunted word today. But when I use it I mean the current controlling power whether it be church, state, or local mores — most of which are deeply embedded in tradition.

We are inclined to resent anything that threatens our snug rest in the securely pillowed arms of some "establishment." Life is more comfortable there and infinitely less dangerous. How much poorer we would be spiritually if Martin Luther had cowered under the church's powerful demands; his "establishment." He even went further and stood up against his own father in defense of his convictions. Years ago we sang:

Dare to be a Daniel!
Dare to stand alone.
Dare to have a purpose firm;
Dare to make it known.

I fear that the Daniels today are receding in the ebb and flow of love for security, and the firm purposes are made flabby by an uncontrolled desire to keep peace with the established powers surrounding us.

I once was a member of a church (not Mennonite) that published in its weekly bulletin the names of those that had attained places of greater secular power during the week. Such as J. W. was promoted to vice-president of the state bank or Mrs. D. B. S. was elected president of the Meadows Country Club auxiliary. So churches play along as well as individuals. In fact they frequently are the "establishment," as they were in Luther's day.

We Can Manage

It does seem that the Christian who is so set upon creating his own security is robbing God. He is shutting out the Holy Spirit and saying in effect, "I really don't need Your care. I can manage for myself." In so doing he is denying the very thing that he professes. We sing, "God will take care of you —" but do we really believe it to the extent that we will take a stand in defense of it? How many of us have been in a position where we could do nothing for ourselves and were forced to rely upon God to see us through?

Sometimes God forces us into such a position. Not always, probably just the more stubborn ones like myself. God knew my stubborn independence so He forced me into a position where I had to say, "I give up. You take over from here." And when my clutch on the securities this world offered was loosened I experienced the greatest and sweetest peace, the most complete sense of security I had ever known, although in the most dire circumstance. I knew that when I had insisted upon defining my security in terms of things of this world I was not only robbing God but also myself.

I know for a certainty that there is no security in the things we are schooled to believe are secure — Security National Bank, Security Investment Company, Security Insurance Company, Social Security, et al. I knew a man who worked hard all his life and saved for a happy retirement. Ten days after retirement he collapsed over his reservations for an anticipated ocean voyage. His heart had given out. He thought he was assured of security for travel in his retiring years.

Need New Frontiers

We have come a long way from our pioneer heritage which was set in insecurity and danger. We as Christians must seek out new frontiers if our souls are to survive this affluent and safe life that we have inherited or at any rate to feel to be our just right. If we take for granted our spiritual prerogative as we do our material possessions, our souls are in danger of shriveling up and we, in spite of ourselves, will become papershells throwing our lives away in an effort to disguise our nothingness.

It is possible that this young, rebellious, defiant generation, in their clumsy, bungling, untried way, are trying to tell us just this. We shudder at their lack of respect for the traditions and affluence we are handing them, and their contempt for our emphasis on material security; and they shudder at the inept blanket of worldly goods we have thrown over us which blinds us to real security, and perhaps insight into a new and fresh meaning to life that they see so clearly.

"As I See It"

Readers are urged to submit material on any issue for this column. Maximum of 400 words.

Pierre Burton, in his book The Comfortable Pew, when speaking of the church's failure in the area of race relations says, "Other great institutions within society — the press and the labor movement, to name two — were well ahead of the established Protestant churches in calling for a change in attitudes and a change in the law. The churches when they finally spoke, merely echoed what had already been said."

We are now in the midst of another crisis, the issue of peace and war. Will historians rightfully level the same indictment against the church as they sort through the rubble of our shattered society? I sense the polarization of people, even Christian people, into two general groups. In these groups there is very little difference in attitudes, for both hate. The difference being only in the object of their hatred.

Let the church speak! Let her tell it like it is. True Christian people belong in neither group. They are called to love all men and stand as ministers of reconciliation between the opposing forces of our society.

The Christian has the plus factor of the redeeming gospel of Christ wherein men are reconciled to God and to one another. It is my plea that we are obedient to our calling for if we are only going to echo what is already being said we are no longer needed as a church. —Richard Bartholomew, North Lima, Ohio.

Guidance in the Commonplace

By Mary M. Good

Divine guidance in the everyday affairs of life is a privilege Christians can, and do, enjoy.

One of these experiences came to Blanche Sell and me in the hot season of 1952. We were going on vacation to Kodia Kanal in south India. Two days we postponed our trip to attend the wedding of our friends, Jehoash Harischandra and Elvina Nathan. Finally we traveled toward Madras and were not very far from the city when our train stopped an unaccountably long time.

We asked one of the trainmen the reason. He told us that the time of the train going to Madras was uncertain. A terrific rainstorm had paralyzed traffic in the Madras area and the railway station had been inundated. He claimed no train had gone into the Madras station for two days. Finally the whistle blew, the engine began puffing, and the train pulled on toward Madras and into the railway station. We made our connection to Kodia Kanal and reached our destination on schedule time.

As we traveled along we talked of spiritual values. We were glad we had been sensitive to the desire of our friends that we wait over two days for the wedding.

That same summer Ruth and Rhoda Ressler, returning from a term of service under MCC in Japan, visited us in India. India was Ruth’s birthplace but she had not been there since she was three years old and Rhoda had never seen the land where her father, J. A. Ressler, labored. The Resslers were to land in Calcutta and I planned to go directly to Calcutta from Kodia Kanal to meet them.

However, because one of our missionaries who also was in Kodia Kanal at that time became ill with polio my vacation was intercepted and I went home to Balodgahan earlier. When the steamship company informed me of the time the boat was arriving I went from Dhamtari by train to Calcutta to meet them.

The boat was due to arrive on Monday, the day after I arrived. So on Monday I busied myself at the downtown railway ticket office trying to get reservations for us on the train scheduled for Bombay the next day. We were going to Raipur, an intermediate station between Calcutta and Bombay. Preference is given to passengers going all the way to Bombay and sometimes there are inconvenient delays for persons wishing to book for intermediate stations. The ticket agent was kind but gave me no assurance that he would be able to give me reservations on the Tuesday train.

The girls arrived on Monday evening and were glad to see a familiar face on the pier as their boat pulled into port. The next morning our first concern was train reservations to Raipur. The ticket agent still had nothing but told us to come back again in the afternoon. This time the agent seemed very pleased and simply told us to go to the railway station in time for the train. It was a long distance to travel by tonga (buggy) and across the famous Howrah Bridge.

When we reached Howrah Station and asked the station master for tickets he knew about us and handed the tickets to us. Our luggage coolies led us to the last bogie on the train and placed our luggage in a compartment with berths for three. A railway official was there and told us to lock our door — that we would not be disturbed.

The train was due to arrive in Raipur the next afternoon. As we traveled along, not very far from our destination it occurred to me that American guests in India had to report to the police upon arrival. I recalled a technicality that they would have to report in the district in which their host (or hostess) lived. They gave their address in India as Balodgahan where I lived. This is a small village eight miles from Dhamtari.

If they had given Dhamtari which is in the Raipur district as their address it would have been simple. They could have registered as they went through Raipur. But Balodgahan is in the Durg district and 60 miles from the town of Durg, the police headquarters for that district. Raipur is as close to Durg as Balodgahan and more accessible. In fact, it is the next railway station beyond Raipur. So we decided that they stay on the train and go to Durg to register with the police there.

At Raipur I alighted with my own and Ruth and Rhoda’s luggage to go the 48 miles to Dhamtari by bus. When I asked the train guard whether he would hold the train until I got tickets for the girls he said, “But that coach will not go farther than Raipur!” They had put it on special for us!

So Ruth and Rhoda sandwiched themselves in a very much overcrowded compartment and went on to Durg. Arriving there, according to instructions, they took advantage of the dilapidated tonga that was usually at the train to accommodate passengers alighting at Durg. They then went to the home of Daniel Sonwani, pastor of the church there, and gave him the note I wrote to him. He went with them to the police where they reported and went back to the railway station where they were able to get the local train going from Nagpur to Raipur. Only sometimes does this train make connections with the little train going daily from Raipur to Dhamtari. This time it did! It made the 48 miles in four to five hours. They arrived in Dhamtari at 11 o’clock that night.
"We know all the languages," Ruth said laughing as they got off the little train. The fact was their good humor helped them through with the foreign language and the "vegetable women" going home from the bazaar enjoyed them, too.

On another occasion, during World War II, I was going home alone from Landour, a hill station in the Himalayas. When the ticket lady came to punch my ticket in Delhi she remarked, "There is trouble in the next compartment. It was reserved for the air force and other soldiers have gone in."

The next day when I got off in Nagpur to change trains for Raipur I was alarmed by a battle going on between a mob of men—Americans and Indians—fistfighting and police wielding clubs. It was right where I had to go through to get to the waiting room. I wondered how I would get through. But my luggage coolie conducted me close to the train past the fighting and I arrived without incident. I was eager to know what the situation was on the European battlefront and asked the Anglo-Indian stewardess in the waiting room for the Statesman, the daily newspaper coming from Calcutta. She spoke anxiously, "No mail train has come through from Calcutta for two days. There has been sabotage and the train has been derailed in one place."

"Where was the derailment?" I asked.

"Between Raipur and Bilaspur," she answered.

"Then the local train can go from Nagpur to Raipur?"

I ventured.

"Yes. They will go as far as Raipur."

That was as far as I wanted to go! When train time came my coolie came and we found all quiet where the battle had raged.

It was good to get to Raipur where I boarded a bus which took me right through Dhamtari to Balodgahan. This got me to Balodgahan earlier than was expected and no one was at the bus station to meet me. The driver having performed his obligation by piling my luggage in the dust by the side of the road, drove on. The distance to my bungalow was too far for me to carry bedding roll, tiffin basket, suitcase, and all the other parcels required in Indian travel. It was getting dark. The only persons in evidence were a villager, a stranger to me, bringing in a load of hemp from his field and a cartman who was camping there for the night. I asked the villager whether he would help me home with my luggage. He put down his load of hemp, asked the cartman to watch it, and carried my luggage to the bungalow. When I thanked him and opened my purse to pay him he said emphatically, "Don't do that," and refused the money. I never saw him again.

It was good to be back home in an Indian village where most of the people did not even know that the world was at war.

As I traveled in India, often alone, sometimes I wished I could write a book on Travel Mercies. So often I received kindnesses from Indians which I'm afraid I never repaid. I must believe in guardian angels. I have been led to believe that sometimes they appear in human form.

The Pastor in a College Community

By Joseph Hertzler

College communities are flexible and mobile. A Mennonite church in such a setting inevitably takes on these characteristics. When persons come from different Mennonite communities, each with a slightly different emphasis, a certain richness accompanies them. A church in a college community usually finds itself blessed with diversity. No one "home" congregation can be the exclusive model so the church is free to choose the style of life and worship which best suits its needs. The Iowa City Mennonite Church is gradually learning to find unity in diversity as we learn to trust each other.

Trust is taking concrete form through shared leadership. For example, each adult Sunday school class now has a chairman who works with a committee to select teachers, study materials, guest speakers, etc., for his respective class. The once demanding job of Sunday school superintendent now largely consists of coordinating undertakings of the various classes. It is beautiful to see shared leadership in action. A decentralization of decision-making seems to be the natural outgrowth of practicing "the priesthood of all believers."

In recent weeks two Sunday school classes have been studying worship and as a result our weekly worship hour is taking on a new feeling of expectancy. Reluctant acceptance has been replaced by persons volunteering to take part in the morning worship hour.

As a congregation we have tried to speak to the university and community about the evils of all war and more specifically the Vietnam War. Some in the church are not comfortable with this prophetic role but have allowed (sometimes grudgingly) those who feel the Spirit of God leading them to speak out against these evils.

It seemed natural for me as a pastor and for several in the congregation to respond to the community unrest which followed the Cambodian invasion and the Kent State killings. Students, community folk, and policemen were talking past each other. I was talking to two young men one midnight at an outdoor rally. They were so uptight that when an unrelated siren began to blow they abruptly broke conversation and ran. Tensions were running high for a week or so. What an opportunity for peacemaking and reconciliation! Fortunately most students believe deeply in nonviolence.

It is exciting to pastor a church in a college community. It is demanding. One is open to misunderstanding. But being part of a congregation that is learning to be the church, and willing to take some risks in the process, is reward enough for me.
The Supernatural Guidance System

By John T. Kreider

How does God guide His people? In developing near flawless guidance systems, has the scientist outclassed God? Has God left His people with a primitive and an unreliable guidance system? How secure is the believer when he turns his life over to the control of God? Allow the writer to suggest that the believer is the only person who can be certain that the guidance system in his life will never fail.

God's guidance system for His people is far advanced to any of the systems guiding spaceships through outer space. Long before scientists discovered how to send man to the moon and how to bring him safely back to earth again, God already had His system perfected and in service. In fact, before the earth was made or anything in it all divine systems were go. And yet, who can claim to be the people of God seem to be the most insecure. Neil Armstrong and his crew, it would seem, had more confidence in the electronic guidance system supplied by NASA than the people of God have in the supernatural system that God has supplied for us. Why is this true?

A startling fact is that the electronic system which guides the Apollos and the supernatural system that guides our lives are by principle alike. When suggesting this I hope I am in no way being irreverent. But I believe the guidance system which operates between Houston and the Apollos illustrates how God guides the life of the believer.

Before Jesus returned to His Father in heaven, He told His disciples that He would give the Holy Spirit to them. He told them that His Holy Spirit would abide with them, in fact, He would be in them. He told them that His Holy Spirit would guide them, teach them, reprove them, and be with them forever. John, the disciple, wrote, "Those who do what God says—they are living with God and He with them. We know this is true because the Holy Spirit He has given us tells us so" (1 Jn. 3:24)*.

Ezekiel said in the eleventh chapter of his message to Israel: "The Spirit lifted me"; "The Spirit said to me"; "The Spirit of the Lord came upon me"; and "The Spirit of God carried me back to Babylon, to the Jews in exile there." The Scriptures are full of this kind of information. Now, how are the two systems alike?

Both the space control system and the supernatural system work as a trinity. First, there is space control located at Houston, Texas. Second, there is the Apollo spacecraft located in space, but very much in contact with space control. Third, there is the crew in the spacecraft subject to space control. The spiritual counterpart involves first of all, Jesus Christ the Son of God, at the Father's right hand in heaven.

Then there is God the Holy Spirit located in the life of the believer, but very much in contact with God the Son in heaven. And then there is the believer subject to God's system of control. Just as Houston and the Apollo spacecraft are at two different locations, the controls are there; so, Jesus and the Holy Spirit in the believer's life are at two different locations, yet the controls are there.

The only way Houston can communicate with the Apollo crew is via the radio system connecting Houston and the spacecraft. Because of this system the craft is kept under control and guided to its destination. Likewise, the only way Jesus can communicate with the believer is via Holy Spirit in the life of the believer. Because of this supernatural system, the believer is assured of safety and success.

But you ask, how important is the crew to the success or failure of a space trip or, how important is the believer to the success or failure of his spiritual journey? Allow me to suggest that as long as the crew in the spacecraft is totally dependent upon space control at Houston there is relatively no problem; but, in the event the crew decides, by a simple act of their own will, to turn off the system and fly the spacecraft independent of Houston, there is real danger of disaster. The believer also plays a very important role in the success or failure of his journey through life.

As long as he depends upon the spiritual guidance system in his life there is absolutely no problem; but, in the event he, by a simple act of his own will, decides to go his life apart from the supernatural system, he will be a sure failure. NASA has supplied the system for the Apollo crews. It is up to the crew to keep it turned on. Likewise, God has supplied the system for the believer. It is up to the believer to keep it turned on.

Why is it that so many of us find it more difficult to trust God's system than the Apollo crews found it to trust an electronic system? Could it be that we have never understood that Christ gave His Holy Spirit to us for this purpose? This is God's only means of communicating with His people.

Without the Spirit of God there is no communication. Even though His guidance system is supernatural, it is also very personal. Through His system we know what He wants us to do. Through His system He knows what we need and how we feel. Through His system Jesus is very real and close to us. His system will never fail. But we must keep it turned on.

The Event on Sunday Morning

By Katie Funk Wiebe

I sense that to be a minister these days can be a vast perplexity to the man himself and also to his congregation. Preachers, as the professional holy men in American life, are sometimes put into the most difficult situations.

The director of one religious broadcast I listen to occasionally emphasizes the gap between preacher and preached to. He frequently interviews laymen from various occupations on his program, adding the odd phrase here and there to make it clear that these laymen, unlike ministers, know what life is really about. Then I understand why some ministers, like some Roman Catholic priests, feel the pressure to return to civilian life.

Because frequent personal contacts between minister and member no longer seem possible, the minister's main contact with most of the members of his congregation is Sunday morning. What he wants to convey to them and what they want to receive from him must be done at this time.

It is for this reason I have in past months pondered the question a concerned minister asked at a study conference on the ministry: What does a church member expect of his minister on Sunday morning? The delegates had been reiterating to one another that the morning service should be an "event."

I think most Christians long for an "event" to happen when they gather for worship, even if they aren't sure what they mean by it. An event takes place when the reality of God in Christ becomes present through the language of prayer, preaching, and singing of hymns. It is an occurrence which produces consequences. It begins on Sunday, but moves into the week. It lasts. Only then can it be called an event.

However, an event may be confused with an emotional experience which is the result of an energetic service. Where- as an event gives the hearer power through God to push back the barriers which tend to smother his spiritual life, it brings no new living space to the hearer; it does not add new words of faith and hope to life. Mostly it can be said of an experience that a good time was had by all. Of such have been many so-called "blessings."

I think a sermon becomes part of an event when it allows the listener to maintain his intellectual integrity. Without this, faith soon becomes shallow. I know that the pressures on any leader today are severe to utter sweeping certitudes about how faith solves problems in an era of turmoil and strife. Yet I think an event will occur oftener when an honest searcher tells another honest searcher what he has discovered in his spiritual pilgrimage with God.

An event occurs when the speaker puts into words what the individual has been trying to piece together out of the poverty of his own mind and spirit. What has been bits and pieces becomes a whole. What was darkness becomes light.

Such a sermon will speak to a specific situation; it isn't just a heap of words about general truths. In journalism classes, we learned that an effective editorial is always hooked to some news event or to some problem hovering in the minds of the readers. A sermon is like that. The preacher, aware of what cloud of doubt rests heavily on his hearers, attempts to lift it.

Yet I think if a sermon is to be an event, it will also include the elements of shock and surprise. Christians need this once in a while and if a preacher loves his congregation and they know it, he can say many shocking truths.

The delight of surprise at some new truth is also needed. Most people, including Christians, cannot stand boredom, even in the name of Christ if they think it could be different. They don't like to be told the same thing every Sunday with the same three points and the same words.

A. W. Tozer, in one of his razor-sharp editorials, wrote that too many sermons "labor the obvious." He said that evangelical Bible teachers don't seem to know that going over the same elementary truths dulls the spiritual faculties of the saints. Move on to higher ground, he suggests.

Yet I would add something else. Like a great painter or poet, the preacher will speak to the mind, but he cannot forget the soul of man, and his need to wonder and to be enriched through words of love and beauty. Man cannot live by cold facts alone, not even those of Scripture.

Why is it that so many Christians today are saved, but seem so desouled? They are bound for heaven, but are stripped bare of spiritual imagination. To them the Word has become the utilitarian means of making life more livable here and of providing a passport to heaven.

To such listeners the preacher must speak as poet-priest not only for the moment, but for all people for all time. The needs of the soul are not met by intellectual arguments or by popularizing the service until it resembles a TV talk show. The needs of the soul are met by reverence and wonder and love and compassion for God and His Word.

Truth, compassion, newness, directed by the Spirit, are the makings of an event.
Silence --
For One Small Boy
By Vincent Edwards

Some will say this incident is hardly worth recording, since in the world of crashing headlines it never raised a ripple. Yet, it may kindle a warm glow in the hearts of good fathers and mothers.

Not so long ago two five-year-olds, Margaret and Ian, were taken by the matron from the Folworth Home for Children in Edinburgh, Scotland, to the zoo. The outing made a big "hit," and to top it off, their good-hearted guide led them into a snack bar.

Milk for both the youngsters was ordered.

As the waitress placed the glasses in front of them, Margaret leaned forward. In a voice that was plainly heard by everyone at the crowded counter, she spoke up, "Remember, Ian, say your grace."

The little boy nodded and bent his head.

An immediate hush settled throughout the room. Not a cup rattled. Even the waitresses stood still as Ian repeated:
"Thank You for the world so sweet,
Thank You for the food we eat,
Thank You for the birds that sing,
Thank You, God, for everything."

Yes, for a moment the busy world of the snack bar was brought to a standstill. And it was all because a small boy was pouring out his thanks to the Giver of all good!

Sunday School Prayer

In this sacred sanctuary,
Old ones, middle-aged, and youth
Come to ask the Spirit's guidance
Into God's eternal truth.

— Mary Alice Holden

Briefly Stated

Some people travel from place to place to tell us how to carry on the Lord's work. What I need, I sighed, is someone to help me to do some of it. So many of us are so busy informing others how to bring people to the Lord, and it seems sometimes so few of us are doing it. Then I studied the situation some more and prayed the Lord to search my groaning heart. I found that God gives some the gift to tell how and some the gift to do. Some have the gift to put truths into right words and others to read them and apply them to their lives. Each is responsible to use his gift for the Lord. — Anna May Garber.

Love Is a Light

Love is a light,
A beacon of prayer,
A flame of faith,
A glow of God's care.

Love is a light,
A torch on the road
Which brightens our path
And lessens our load.

Concerned that Roman Catholic religious formulations may become "nationally tinted," a Catholic peace advocate called for the removal of American flags from Catholic Churches.

"I'm calling for separation of church and state from the other side," Prof. Gordon Zahn, a sociologist from the University of Massachusetts, told participants in a seminar at the twenty-fourth annual New England Conference of Religious Education at Providence College.

Dr. Zahn, who is also chairman of the American Pax Society and a sponsor of the Catholic Peace Fellowship, said that "if we can travel in Europe and not encounter the national flag in the churches we should be able to do the same here."

At the Orient's first World's Fair, the Pocket Testament League has experienced an unusual breakthrough in its campaign of Scripture distribution. Crowds visiting Expo '70 have averaged 350,000 each day since the World's Fair opened with a grand display of earthly splendor by 79 participating nations and some 40 private exhibitors. During the first 15 days, 68,000 Gospels of John were distributed by the Pocket Testament League in the Christian pavilion.

Amish workers facing discharge from their jobs because their religious beliefs forbid union membership have now been permitted to retain their positions in a three party agreement.

I. W. Abel, International president of the United Steelworkers of America; George E. Watson, president of Alco Building Products Division of Harvard Industries, and William C. Lindholm, national chairman of the National Committee for Amish Religious Freedom, have signed an agreement whereby Amish workers will be permitted to work at the Sugareeck, Ohio, plant without union membership, but will instead contribute an amount equal to union dues which the union will in turn contribute to a recognized charity.

A leader of the American Baptist Convention said that the "youth revolution" in the U.S. is slipping from its original idealistic level.

"It started out on the high altruistic level of brotherhood," said Dr. J. Lester Harnish, president of Eastern Baptist College and Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, "but it is slipping to elitism, a 'we're in but you're out' attitude."

He also contended that there has been a slip "from idealism to nihilism, from courage to terror, and from sacrifice to suicide."

Since the liberalized state abortion law became effective on July 1 at least 11,288 abortions have been performed in New York City hospitals.

Preliminary figures received by the Health and Hospitals Corporation for the July 1 — Aug. 22 period show 3,400 abortions performed at voluntary community hospitals, 4,143 at municipal hospitals and 3,745 at 27 of the city's 34 private hospitals.

Candles burning near skulls in eerie cemeteries . . . family vaults and tombs are desecrated . . . a man with a cross hunts "vampires" . . . "evil rites" drive a rector away from an ancient chapel.

These are but a few of the outward signs of Britain's latest "in" craze — witchcraft and black magic. Behind the scenes are the witches' secret meetings, complete with altar, masks, death curses, and ceremonial nude practices.

All bunk, as one news columnist charged? Or a serious business, as "king witches" and some churchmen maintain?

The answer may lie somewhere between the two. The facts are that witchcraft and black magic — or "white magic," some say — are booming in Britain's current permissive society. The rise is traced to various causes: decay of religion, illicit sexual deviation, or the impact of the black population. Although there are distinct differences in British witchcraft and, for an example, "juju" of Africa.

A leading authority on the subject is Charles Pace, known to witches as "Hamar-At." He estimates there are 30,000 practicing witches in Britain and more than 500,000 ordinary people interested in black magic.

"Unlike the churches, many of which get emptier each year, witchcraft is steadily gaining adherents," he wrote after taking part in an investigation sponsored by the racy Sunday newspaper News of the World.

"Church leaders who blame TV for their empty pews are altogether too complacent," said Mr. Pace. "Although TV . . . will satisfy people of limited imaginations, there are others who demand something more positive."

Preaching to the already converted is one of the major weaknesses of evangelical Christianity, Dr. Carl F. H. Henry, editor-at-large of Christianity Today magazine, told the final session of the First Canadian Congress on Evangelism in Ottawa.

Delivering a paper on the theology of evangelism, Dr. Henry told 600 delegates — representing 34 Protestant denominations and 12 religious societies — that man's spiritual crisis is also an intellectual one and that evangelism has the job of not only preaching the gospel but of teaching the validity of that gospel.

He criticized evangelicals for their inability to reach those not committed to evangelism through effective use of the mass media and charged that they confined their work largely to those already converted.

The First Canadian Congress on Evangelism, attended by 600 delegates representing 34 Protestant denominations and 12 religious societies, concluded with a service of witness in front of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Led by a 25-member Salvation Army Band, the delegates marched four long city blocks from the conference site, the National Arts Center, to the court building.

Alcoholism among Britain's young people is becoming a problem that "should give far more cause for alarm than drug addiction," according to a medical report issued in London.

Published by the Medical Council on Alcoholism, the report outlined the results of research undertaken since the Council began operations in 1967.

According to Dr. Max Glatt, vice-chairman of the Council, "One sees an increasing number of alcoholics in their 20s. Many of them say they have been drinking to excess for more than 10 years. The trend in this country is that alcoholics are getting younger."

Southern Baptists were told that "God is clobbering Southern Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians for being such reflectors of culture that the church can't prophesy."

Bill Lawson, pastor of Wheeler Avenue Baptist Church, Houston, said the church preaches what business, industry, and the military is telling the church to say and, therefore, is preaching "our culture."

He addressed the annual Baptist Student Conference of the Southern Baptist Convention.
Board Hosts Conference Editors

On Sept. 28, 29, thirteen editors and staff assistants of Mennonite district conference periodicals met with staff members of the Mennonite Board of Missions’ Information Services Division in Elkhart, Ind. The purpose: to explore the role of district publications in the life of the brotherhood, share problems and solutions, review Missions Week planning, and discover what kinds of materials district editors want for their publications. All but three conference editors were able to attend.

Basic input for the assembly came from conference editors themselves. J. Lorne Peachev, Scottsdale, Pa.; Mahlon Hess, Salunga, Pa.; and Moses Slabaugh, Harrisonburg, Va., initiated the discussions on “the role and function of district conference publications.” Conference papers, they said, could provide some local, personal, and specialized informational-inspirational material to readers that general church periodicals cannot. The group concurred, however, that articles and editorials that help form local opinion and build conviction are often missing. Discovering ways to communicate with diverse audiences both in terms of age and theological background is a basic problem that demanded attention.

Determining local audiences, finding editorial resources on the district level, and receiving advice on attractive layout and design received major consideration during the two days of informal, open-ended discussion. The Sept. 29 session concluded with a press conference as Board program administrators shared current concerns and responded to questions from the editorial group.

The editorial meeting was primarily intended to build relationships between the General Board and conference editors, according to Boyd Nelson, secretary for Information Services. He noted that a sizable number of the participants favor a second meeting in early 1971 to include more input on layout, photography, and sharpening editorial skills.

“The problem with the meeting is that we were 30 years late in planning it,” was Ezra Beachy’s way of summarizing the editorial gathering. Beachy, from Goshen, Ind., has served as editor of Gospel Evangel, the bimonthly organ of the Indiana-Michigan Mission Board, since 1945.

Inter-Varsity Convention to Attract Students

Urbana ‘70, the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship Missionary Convention, will be held Dec. 27-31 on the University of Illinois campus in Champaign-Urbana. The IVCF Convention, held once every three years, has two dimensions of focus: to motivate missions interest among students and to acquaint them with the various mission agencies and personnel openings. More than 250 mission boards from across the Protestant-evangelical spectrum will be represented this year.

Mennonite representation to Urbana ‘70 is being coordinated by COMBS (Council of Mennonite Mission Boards). This year eight or nine mission boards representing the various Mennonite bodies will be present, each with its own display materials and service personnel for counseling. In 1967 over 100 Mennonite students from church, state college, and university campuses were among the 9,000 persons in attendance. A similar response is expected this year.

An important dimension of Mennonite involvement this year will be an emphasis on the peace witness and provision for draft information and counseling. Virgil Brenneman, executive secretary of Student Services for the Mennonite Church, referred to Urbana ‘67 when Mennonite students became “instant counselors” to evangelical students who were interested in the peace witness and in alternatives to military service.

This year, with the consent of Inter-Varsity’s leadership, Student Services and the MCC Peace Section will be prepared with personnel and literature to meet such a demand. A seminar on war and peace and its relation to the missionary witness is also anticipated.

The Urbana ‘70 Convention theme is “World Evangelism: Why? How? Who?” The program will blend unchanging biblical principles and the need for commitment to Jesus Christ as Lord with the practical circumstances and problems to be faced in working out that commitment in today’s world.

Seminars will treat more than 40 subjects on an elective basis; small groups will meet each morning and evening for Bible study, prayer, and fellowship; and each evening student groups will present contemporary music as an evangelism medium. Each morning a panel of students will question speakers in an unhearsed way. Leighton Ford will offer the keynote address: “Is Man Really Lost?” Myron S. Augsburger, president of Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., is also listed on the program roster.

Brenneman pointed out that in 1967...
Student Services provided scholarships to Mennonite students who requested assistance in attending the Urbana convention. Similar funds are not available this year, he said. It is suggested that Mennonite congregations explore the possibility of providing scholarships for their students. An alternative would be for district conferences and youth offices to offer scholarship funds to students from their respective districts. Total convention cost is $55, including a registration fee of $20. Travel expense is extra.

Who may attend? All college and nursing school students, high school seniors, those associated with the academic world, missionaries, and pastors.

TV Spots Claim 23 Percent Recall

"TV stations are benefiting a substantial number of viewers by use of religious public service spots. Religious spots are being seen and remembered amid the jungle of commercial advertising," says David Thompson of Mennonite Advertising Agency, Harrisonburg, Va. "As evidence one should examine the 23 percent recall pulled by the 1970 Family Life TV Spots during a telephone survey in four cities."

The survey was conducted during July in Albuquerque, Denver, Lincoln, and Oklahoma City. A telephone sampling was made to over 4,298 people in these cities.

Persons who question the value of religious TV spots placed for public service release should note that 25 percent of the persons called remembered the Family Life Spots and over 30 percent of these persons were able to describe the content in detail. Says Thompson, "We were pleasantly surprised and very encouraged by the findings."

Family Life TV Spots work at building better family communications. Two current 60-second spots describe the effects of parents rejecting their children. One 30-second spot pinpoints the communications breakdown in marriage and suggests the spiritual resources available to couples to help them build bridges of understanding and love.

Family Life TV Spots were released in June. Over 400 U.S. stations requested the spots for public service scheduling in addition to NBC network. In Canada, both CBC and CTV networks are using the spots.

A group of 15 stations in South Australia have recently accepted the spots for programming. "We are very impressed with these," a spokesman there declared. "Already we have begun to screen the Family Life TV Spots and they are receiving extremely good audience reaction."

Mennonite Advertising Agency distributes Family Life TV Spots for the Mennonite Church, General Conference Mennonite Church, and Mennonite Brethren Churches, USA.

Mr. Thompson, commending the stations for their sincere concern for family harmony in the community, said, "Family relations- ships are a major interest for stations who are involved in the life of their communities. It is estimated that stations and networks have given over $5 million in free public service time to Family Life TV Spots this year."

Students Dig in Where It Helps

While the Harrisonburg merchants were busily arranging tempting displays and stocking free hot dogs and Cokes for the annual Freshman Days, Eastern Mennonite College students were making purchases too, but not of bedspreads and bookcases.

Armed with paintbrushes and lumber, a group of 20 students, led by Pastor of Students, Truman H. Brunk, began renovation of a small tan house on September 19 in south Park View, the suburb northwest of Harrisonburg where EMC is located.

A family had occupied the house several years ago before it had been finished. For one thing, it lacked insulation, as the team of students noted while painting inside sheltering rooms.

In other ways, students gave the little house a face-lifting. Outside, carpenters built front and back porches and attached missing doorknobs. A coat of paint freshened up the siding.

When Mr. Brunk introduced the project during the first campus church service of the year, a group of 120 young people signed up.

"You're eligible if you've ever held a paintbrush," Mr. Brunk said and those who lacked the manual skills contributed money to pay for building supplies.

An EMC faculty member volunteered to guarantee rent for the coming year if the family is unable to pay because of sickness and lack of suitable jobs.

"It was beautiful to see those youth out there working elbow to elbow with each other," Mr. Brunk reflected.

So they were all set. EMC students completed the majority of the work on the house in one day, but may have gotten themselves in for an even bigger job.

Robert J. Sullivan, a city planner from Harrisonburg, spoke on housing conditions in campus church Sunday morning following the first Saturday project.

Mr. Sullivan commented, "I'm really excited by what you young people have done on this house and can see this kind of thing happening all over Harrisonburg."

Mr. Brunk suggested that churches and businessmen might be glad to back a student team of workers with money for supplies. And so the idea is still growing.

Student volunteers have agreed to work with Mr. Sullivan as a contact man in the repairing of houses—anything from light plumbing and electrical repairs to carpentry work and painting. "There's nothing the community likes better than to see dollars spent concretely and to see students involved constructively," said Mr. Sullivan about the planned renovations.

But repairing houses is not the only thing EMC students have planned to better the community.

John Honeycutt, Rockingham County visiting teacher, has been working with Project Concern. This includes Saturday...
Adoption and tutoring programs for underprivileged youngsters, as well as work with preschool children and a clothes closet for needy families.

"I want to tell you," said Mr. Honeycutt speaking to EMC students, "it's largely because of EMC's example that Saturday Adoption has spread to other campuses in Virginia."

Mr. Honeycutt presented new phases of Project Concern. There are plans for nutrition classes for mothers and day care centers for their children while mothers attend classes. Project Concern also plans work with migrant families and a transportation pool to keep projects rolling.

Sophomore Jim Krabill, chairman of EMC campus church from Elkart, Ind., said, "The whole purpose of the program is to give more students opportunities to participate. There are many bored kids just looking for constructive things to do."

As one girl with paint flecked across her face noted, "We wouldn't be caught dead doing this for money." — Jewel Showalter.

Costs to Be Held Low in Evangelism Consultation

Situation: Holding a historic All-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism, April 13-16, 1972. Problem: Keeping costs down so a true cross section of the Mennonite brotherhood can participate, to keep it from being an outing for "affluent Mennonites only."

Complication: To find a near-central location, with adequate motel-hotel accommodation and meeting rooms for 2,000 people.

Solution: Chicago and the Conrad Hilton Hotel, where rates are moderate — $12 a day per person, two in a room — and where all necessary large meeting rooms are free for a guaranteed volume of 300 rooms rented for the three-night, four-day stay.

Added benefits: Nearby hotels, YMCA, etc., for cheaper accommodations; ample opportunities for Consultation Action Groups to visit some of the many existing mission programs in Chicago's inner city; easy access by air or freeway for Canadians and American Mennonites from distant points.

Low registration fees: To be self-liquidating, operating costs of the All-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism will be paid through low advance registration fees, not including meals: Student — $20; Single — $40; Couple — $60. Meals can be bought at a number of nearby low-cost restaurants.

Planners do not anticipate any rise in costs, but people who wish to attend are being urged to register as soon as possible at the present low-fee levels.

Asia to Hold First Mennonite Conference in 1971

Information was provided by P. J. Malagar, director of the Mennonite Christian Service Fellowship of India (MCSFI), on the planning session held for the first Asia Mennonite Conference. Mennonite and Brethren in Christ mission boards will assist the Asia churches in holding this conference through the Council of Mission Board Secretaries and the Mennonite Central Committee.

The first Asia Mennonite Conference will be held in October and November 1971. A planning session was held for the conference at the Faith Love Christian Children Hostel in Fanling, New Territories, Hong Kong, Aug. 10-15. The planning session was held in connection with the Sixth International Reconciliation Work Camp, an annual feature of the Northeast and Southeast Asian Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches.

Delegates from Japan, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Indonesia, and India attended the planning session. During the session, a planning committee for the conference was selected, and S. Djodjihardjo, Indonesia, was named chairman. Others serving on the committee include: P. J. Malagar, secretary-coordinator, India; Everett Metzler, treasurer, Hong Kong; Carl Beck, recording secretary, Japan; and Hiroshi Yanada, Japan; Simon Wung, Taiwan; Harry Law, Hong Kong; and Samuel Setianto, Indonesia.

Mennonite mission work in Asia dates back to 1851 when the Dutch Mennonites first went to Indonesia. India had its first Mennonite missionary from Russia in 1890. The Asia Conference will draw both older and younger churches to a fellowship for the first time since their founding.

In his report of the planning session, Malagar wrote, "We are thankful to our heavenly Father for making available the resources of the North American and European Mennonite churches in establishing these churches and fellowships. MCC rings a bell in our hearts for the good services they have rendered in this part of the world for the past three decades."

The planning committee has set aside March 7, 1971, as a day of special prayer and intercession to be observed by all Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches in Asia. It is hoped that others will share in the ministry of the conference through their prayers and giving.

Korea Child Training Completes Last Course

The fourteenth and last child care training course in Taegu, Korea, ended in June with 21 ladies receiving certificates at the graduation.

The Christian Child Training Course (CCT) was begun 7 1/2 years ago by the Mennonite Central Committee after the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs authorized the CCT program for the two southeasternmost provinces of Korea. There are 233 orphanages, babies' homes, and day care centers in this area, and most of the trainees in the program are workers at these institutions.

Miss Helen Tieszen has served as coordinator for the program. Two teaching associates from Korea complete the CCT staff. Various members of MCC and the community helped in teaching the courses. Professors from colleges and universities in Taegu, Pusan, and Seoul also gave their time and services as lecturers and counselors for the CCT staff.

The main purpose of the course for training the institutional staff is to improve the day-to-day care of children by increasing the staff's awareness of the children's needs and improving their skills in meeting these needs.

The course is divided into two terms. The first is six weeks long and consists of lectures emphasizing the child's personality and intellectual development, Christian education, health and hygiene, and group activities. The trainee's actual observation and supervision of children during this term is limited.

The second phase of the trainee's course is the application of these ideas at their regular places of work. Three concurrent daily projects are assigned to each trainee. In addition, trainees are required to keep a daily journal of their activities and the children's responses. The first of the three projects is to work with a child the trainee dislikes. The second is to have group activities with the children. For the third project, the trainees can choose between Christian education, health and hygiene, or daily routine work with children.

The CCT staff visits each trainee two times during each of the field projects. These visits help the trainees to get started on the projects and to solve any problems encountered in carrying the projects out.

Since the beginning of the CCT, 310 matrons and housemothers have completed the 14-week course. Short courses and seminars for the graduates are held on a regular basis.

When MCC leaves Korea in March 1971, the graduates will continue to meet on a bimonthly schedule for discussions and study of mutual interest. Already they have elected officers and chosen advisers from interested persons in the community.
Selective Service Strives to Handle Influx of COs

Numerous news stories have commented on the rapidly growing number of conscientious objector claims filed before the 4,000 United States draft boards. The National Interreligious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors (NISBCO) learned at its fall meeting, Sept. 21, that Selective Service expects the number of new I-Ws (conscientious objectors at work) to reach 17,000 during the next year. In 1969, about 5,000 I-Ws reported to civilian work assignments.

These numbers alone are forcing the new administration of Selective Service, under Director Curtis W. Tarr, to consider revisions in alternate service for conscientious objectors. At this point a Selective Service Task Force is studying various possible reforms which minimally will include considerable expansion of approved job assignments for I-Ws. Another factor apparently influencing forthcoming Selective Service decisions is pressure for a national service program. Congressman Jonathan Bingham (R — N.Y.) has introduced legislation which would make all young men eligible for military or civilian service. The choice of service would be voluntary except for those selected by the lottery.

NISBCO, currently chaired by William T. Snyder and administered by Warren Hoover, watches developments in Selective Service closely. The MCC Peace Section continues to keep Mennonite agencies and service counselors informed of any specific proposed changes. The Peace Section plans an interview with Director Tarr in the near future.

Out-Spokin' Continues Operations

Out-Spokin' bicycling tours are being firmed up for this fall and into the new year, according to Jerry Miller, recently appointed director for the program. Miller, who also schedules and directs Volunteer Service orientation schools at Mennonite Board of Missions, assumed program director responsibilities for Out-Spokin' in May 1970.

Several long-distance bicycling tours now tentatively scheduled include a father-son hike in Indiana for Oct. 23-25, a Florida MYF excursion during Christmas vacation this year, and an interterm trip in the spring of 1971 for Hesston (Kan.) College students. Both the Indiana and Florida tours are open to any interested persons. The heaviest scheduling is expected to occur during the 1971 summer months.

Miller pointed out that registration fees for Out-Spokin' participants include insurance coverage and meals. Cost is a variable factor based on actual mileage and time involved, he said. A Suzuki cycle, 25 Huffy and Schwinn 10-speed racing bikes, a trailer with kitchen and individual lockers are the property of the Out-Spokin' organization.

The Out-Spokin' program, which began in 1967, is sponsored by the Relief and Service Division of Mennonite Board of Missions. A board of directors formed in April 1969 provides direction to Out-Spokin' and arranges the necessary funds for operation.

Persons wishing to receive more information on the operating philosophy of Out-Spokin' or to reserve available equipment and schedule a cycling tour should write to Jerry Miller at Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Students Admitted to College Nursing

Thirty-six sophomores have been admitted to the course of studies in professional nursing at Goshen College, Orpha B. Mosemman, director of the division of nursing, announced.

Students began their clinical experience in nursing in September after completing the required three trimesters of basic liberal arts studies. Successful completion of the four-year program leads to the BS in Nursing degree and the choice of a career in nursing at a variety of health settings. With graduate studies, careers are open in research, college teaching, nursing administration, or consulting.

Kratz on Administrative Visit

James Kratz, associate secretary of Overseas Missions at Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., is visiting missionaries in 17 locations in Ecuador, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil, and Venezuela. He left Oct. 11 and will return on Nov. 26.

During the routine administrative trip Kratz will attend the school year closing at Evangelical Mennonite Seminary in Montevideo, Uruguay. He will also participate in the annual meeting of the Seminary Board. Three staff members of the Seminary — John Driver, B. Frank Byler, and Daniel Miller — are sponsored by Mennonite Board of Missions. In 1969 student enrollment was 37.

In Bolivia Kratz will explore possibilities for the Paraguayan and Argentina Mennonite churches to establish a church ministry program in conjunction with the existing Mennonite Central Committee service program. Almost a year ago Jose Gallardo, from Brussels, Belgium, now completing his third year at the Montevideo Seminary, conducted a three-month evangelism/church ministry term in Bolivia.

Kratz plans to visit all Mennonite Board of Missions-related personnel in Latin America. Approximately 40 percent of the 185 overseas personnel with MBMC are serving in Latin America. Seven persons serve in teaching assignments throughout Latin America as short-term Overseas Missions Associates.

New Fellowship in Suburban Washington, D.C.

Several families living in northern Virginia have been meeting and planning for the formation of a fellowship for worship and service since spring 1970. Plans have now developed to the point that regular Sunday morning worship began Oct. 4, 1970. The families are all of Mennonite background; some are members of the First Mennonite Church of Hyattsville, Md., and others are currently members of other congregations.

The format for the services is planned to be talks by guest speakers or group members with discussion to follow. A children's service is also being planned.

The group desires to be responsible to the needs of the community and will be open to all people seeking a meaningful commitment. It is not intended to be limited to those of Mennonite background.

The group will seek to work cooperatively with all Christian churches in the area. It is hoped that the fellowship may be a reconciling force among those who are seeking in areas of spiritual and social need and concern.

Anyone who is living in or moving to this area is invited to worship with the group.

For further information regarding place and time of meeting, etc., contact: Ralph Luggbill, 11801 Valley Rd., Fairfax, Va. 22030. Phone: 703 273-0065.

New Vistas for MDS

The Mennonite Disaster Service Section of the Mennonite Central Committee met near Chicago on Sept. 17, 18 to consider suggestions for an expanded ministry to victims of disaster in the United States and Canada. Among the ideas under consideration is the establishment of a full-time executive coordinator to promote more complete involvement of the laity of Mennonite and related churches in ministering to the needs of the poverty stricken in urban areas.

In other sessions members learned of the intensified efforts of MDS units to relate to agencies concerned with the needs of racial minorities in St. Louis, Wichita, Pittsburgh, and Philadelphia. Eddie Bearinger, Region V director, Elmira, Ont., reported that a delegation from Yugoslavia had made a special effort to seek out the Ontario organization of MDS to learn what had motivated Mennonites to participate in the rebuilding of the city of Skopje after the disastrous earthquake of 1962. The Section also encouraged the executive coordinator to maintain the home-building program in and about Corpus Christi, Texas, throughout the winter if the need persists and if volunteers continue to be available. They authorized the spending of up to $5,000 to cover the overhead costs of this project, and they encouraged the constituency to contribute toward this expense.

A special MDS committee is planning the annual All-Unit Meeting to be held at Calgary, Alta., Feb. 12, 13, 1971. The focus of discussions will be on responsibility in brotherhood. The Alberta MDS unit leader, Peter Dick, met with the Program Committee in Chicago to help plan details of program and hosting of delegates from the more than 40 North American units.

The MDS Section consists of representatives of each of the church groups supporting MDS, and the director of each of the five regions into which the MDS units have been divided.

The next Section Meeting is scheduled to be held on Feb. 12, 1971, in Calgary, Alta., just preceding the All-Unit Meeting.

Inter-City Experiences Reported

At a recent forum meeting the Elkhart, Ind., seminary community heard several reports from students who participated in the Urban Ministries Program for Seminarians (UMPS) last summer in Chicago. This program, financed by a grant from Lilly Endowment, Inc., and coordinated administratively by Dean Ross T. Bender of the Associated Seminaries and directed by Professor Gilbert James of Asbury Theological Seminary, sought to expose the students to the problems of inner-city ministry through personal involvement and study in an urban setting.

Thirty-one students and their families representing seven seminaries worked in inner-city churches assisting pastors, organizing day camps, reading pertinent literature, attending lectures, supervising field trips for ghetto children—all in an attempt to minister to the needs of the ghetto community. Their reports indicated that the experience had been challenging and sometimes frightening as they became more personally involved in the implications of Christ's call to minister in this new and often hostile environment.

The volatile racial atmosphere of the ghetto was a dominant theme throughout the reports. The experience seemed to suggest that possibly the greatest challenge the church faces today is the challenge of the inner city.

Participants from the Associated Seminaries included Ruth Ann Bixler, Kidron, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. Ronald Brunk, Newton, Kan.; Mr. and Mrs. Lorne Friesen, Portage la Prairie, Man.; and Mr. and Mrs. Menno Epp, Abbotsford, B.C.

Each Monday this term some time is being set aside for Bible study groups studying the Gospel of Matthew. Professor Howard Charles has opened the study with two presentations on the background of the Gospel during the half-hour chapel period. During the following lunch hour the community divides into small groups for discussion of the questions raised.

Administrative Changes at Akron

Three administrative changes were approved by the Mennonite Central Committee Executive Committee when it met at Akron Sept. 25, 26, 1970.

Lavon Welty, who had been serving as acting director of Personnel Services for the past year, was named Secretary of Personnel Services. Welty is a graduate of Goshen College with a BA in English. He also attended the Goshen Biblical Seminary for one year. From 1963-65 he served as a Paxman in Burundi, Central Africa. He and his wife Carol are members of the Akron Mennonite Church, Akron, Pa.

Kenneth Neufeld was named to the position of Associate Secretary of Personnel Services. He is a graduate of Waterloo Lutheran University, Waterloo, Ont., with a BA in English, and of the Mennonite Brethren Bible College with a Th.B. Neufeld and his wife Kathryn served under the MCC Teachers Abroad Program in Nigeria 1965-68. They are members of the Central Mennonite Brethren Church, Saskatoon, Sask.

Paul Leatherman was named Director of Voluntary Service. He is a graduate of Goshen College where he received a BA in mathematics and chemistry. During 1946 he and his wife Loretta served in Puerto Rico in CPS. In 1947 they returned to Puerto Rico and he became business manager of the unit for two years. From 1966-68 they served in Vietnam. He became associate director of Voluntary Service in 1968 and was named acting director of the department in August 1969. The Leathermans are members of the Akron Mennonite Church, Akron, Pa.

Audiovisuals Survey Overseas Missions

A film and a filmstrip having overseas missions themes are recent additions to the Mennonite Board of Missions' audiovisual library in Elkhart, Ind.

Medical groups in North America should have special interest in Free Indeed, a documentary of Ludhiana Medical College and Hospital in India. Ludhiana is considered one of the foremost examples of modern medical missions.

Free Indeed, 30 minutes in color and produced by the college's medical board, features eye clinics in local villages and a tour of the hospital with emphasis on prosthetics (replacement of mission limbs) and rehabilitation facilities.

Through striking photography from Africa and lively narration on record, Drumbeat to Dialogue shows how persons of different cultures communicate with each other. The 80-frame filmstrip also explains how communication becomes complicated by advancing technology in developing nations and the effect this has on missionary outreach. Brief printed resources accompany the filmstrip.

Free Indeed and Drumbeat to Dialogue are available free on loan from Audiovisuals, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514. A complete catalog listing of more than 250 film and filmstrip titles available through Mennonite Board of Missions may be obtained from the same address.

FIELD NOTES

All-Day Bible Meeting at Hershey Mennonite Church, Dover, Pa., Sat. eve. and Sunday, Oct. 17, 18.

Women's One-Day Retreat at EMBMC headquarters, Salunga, Pa., Oct. 22. Mrs. Jo Tan, Ephrata, Pa., formerly from Indonesia, a minister's wife and Bible teacher, will speak on "Life in the Blood." For information or reservation contact Mrs. Rohrer Hershey, R. 3, Lititz, Pa. 17543, or phone 717-626-5549.

Daniel M. Longenecker was installed as pastor of the Lebanon Mennonite Church, Lebanon, Ore., Oct. 4. Gordon Horst, chairman of the Board of Elders, presided. Harold Hochstetler, the assisting bishop, served as speaker. The newly appointed conference minister for the area, Cleo Mann, was in charge of the commissioning service.

Four students from Eastern Mennonite High School were named semifinalists in the 1970-71 National Merit Scholarship program. The students are Charles Brubaker, Paul Doctorian, Daniel Mullet, and Jon Schrock. Mullet is not enrolled at EMHS this term; he moved to Canada with his parents. Doctorian is from Lebanon; this is his second year at EMHS.

Semifinalists must advance to finalist standing to be considered for the Merit Scholarships to be awarded next spring. semifinalists become finalists by receiving endorsement of their schools, substantiating their high performance on a second examination, and providing information about their achievements and interests.

A retreat to help congregational MYF officers and sponsors tool up for the year is planned for Oct. 23-25 at Laurelville Church Center. Leaders are Art and Nova Smoker and Delbert and Lu Etta Culp. Emphasis will be placed on being a caring Christian, learning to lead groups, discovering new program resources, and developing the year's program.

The retreat will begin at 8:00 p.m., Friday, and conclude at 12:00 noon on Sunday. Cost is $20.00 for the weekend. Send your registration to Laurelville Church Center, R. 5, Box 145, Mount Pleasant, Pa. 15666.

Mennonite Board of Missions' missionary personnel in West Africa recently held a retreat at Ho on the Niger River in Ghana. Marlin and Ruth Miller, workers in Paris, France, led the discussion on the "Nature and Mission of the Church," based on a study of Ephesians. Fifteen workers currently serve in West Africa with MBMC.

Readers Say

I appreciated very much the article, "The Baptism and Filling of the Holy Spirit," in the Sept. 22 issue of Gospel Herald. This relevant, well-written article cleared up for me some of the issues involved in understanding the Holy Spirit's work in my life. Sometimes we get so involved in seeking dramatic evidences of the Spirit's presence, that we miss the blessings of allowing Him to fill us daily.

It was refreshing to read an article on this subject. It sometimes seems that we get so "hung up" on the issue of nonresistance that articles on other important biblical teachings are excluded from our church papers.—Cleo Lehman, Butler, Pa.

I appreciate the Gospel Herald. There are some articles that provoke dissent more readily than others. One of these is "The Name of the Christian Game," by David Poling in the Sept. 8 issue.

It is a fallacy to ascribe to youth alone virtue and idealism while the older generation seems to be lacking any noble characteristics. Let's stop glorifying youth and heaping abuse on age. After all, we all share the same imperfections. The older generation should always be ready to admit its own weaknesses and warn the younger generation of the cocksurety and arrogance exhibited so often today.

The assumption that God, as our contemporary, is working in the revolution seems rather risky. There has been much ferment and change in history—take the rise of fascism or communism take the Thirty Years War in Europe. Yes, God may bring judgment on our society through the revolutionaries but this does not automatically mean His stamp of approval on all the revolutionaries. Let us not be blinded by Old Testament history. Nebuchadnezzar brought God's judgment on His people but he and his empire disappeared, discarded like a dried-up haystack.

It is easy to associate all inequities and inconsistencies with the establishment and the noble causes and virtue with the youthful revolutionaries. The burnings, bombings, and the language used by many of the revolutionaries show the unfortunate fact that the establishment does not have a monopoly on vice. Sin is sin, violence is violence wherever it is perpetrated. If we cannot condone American establishment violence in Vietnam or on the campuses we cannot condone revolutionary violence be the causes ever so justified.

It was the genius of the Anabaptists that they, on the basis of their understanding of the Bible, could not identify with the Catholic establishment nor with the Protestant revolutionaries, but sought instead to be God's people free from the social and political movements of that day. This is the only position we can take while at the same time maintaining a deep Christian love to all men. The establishment is of the world and the revolutionaries of the world but we are to be of God. May God grant us in the coming confrontation the same genius, to be biblical, with a radical Christian ethic, yet free from the entanglements of social, political, and religious movements that have their origin in man and not in God.—Carl Wessellhoft, Logan, Ohio.

I would like to comment on Susan Weber's article, "It Happened to Me" (Sept. 22 issue). I have never spoken, neither have I heard anyone speak in "tongues." I do not nor will I condemn her for believing as she does.

I agree with her wholeheartedly that obedience to God does not dictate favor. I have discovered this in a different way.

I have turned to the Bible for many truths that I'm searching for. One truth that impresses me most is that God saves by grace, not by obedience. God accepts us as we are. Many believe that obeying God will get them to heaven. Reaching heaven seems to be their only reason for obeying. I have discovered something greater—a oneness with God.

No longer do I obey just to reach heaven. I obey because I love God. He accepts me just as I am. I know He is Lord. He's here, I can feel His very presence.

My heart goes out to Him constantly in prayer. Since God accepts me as I am, I can now accept others as they are. My heart goes out to all.

Whether you discover these truths through "tongues" as Susan Weber did or by reading the Scriptures as I did, you'll exclaim with all of us, "Hallelujah, God loves me!"—Jerry Miller, Archbold, Ohio.

I sincerely thank you for printing the testimony that appeared in the Sept. 22 issue of Gospel Herald. I hope and pray the time will soon be here when this precious experience can be accepted without opposition from within the brotherhood. I am deeply concerned that as a Mennonite Church we may not miss the experience of Pentecost because of our concern for terminology. I praise the Lord that I too can say it happened to me, and because it did I love my Savior more and can praise Him better.
— Erdrine Stutzman, Mantua, Ohio.

Christian Mission and the Shape of the Future
By Wilbert R. Shenk

The Gospel of Matthew records an exchange between Jesus and the Sadducees and Pharisees concerning the future. As Matthew records it:

Some Pharisees and Sadducees came to Jesus. They wanted to trap him, so they asked him to perform a miracle for them, to show God's approval. But Jesus answered: "When the sun is setting you say, 'We are going to have fine weather, because the sky is red.' And early in the morning you say, 'It is going to rain, because the sky is red and dark.' You can predict the weather by looking at the sky; but you cannot interpret the signs concerning these times! How evil and godless are the people of this day!" Jesus added. "You ask me for a miracle? No! The only miracle you will be given is the miracle of Jonah." So he left them and went away (Mt. 16:1-4).

Jesus' taunt to the Sadducees and Pharisees was that they were unable to interpret the deeper meaning of their time. Would Jesus similarly taunt the church today for our inability to perceive the meaning of our time? The church will only live in hope if she is able to discern what God is doing now as a further stage in the building of His kingdom.

What are the "signs" in our day which will help us to anticipate the future? The following nine observations should be helpful to us in facing the next several years responsibly.

Mankind's Continuing Need for Religion

In recent years there has been much speculation about the role of religion in the future. There is abundant evidence that all religions are under attack as new competitors arise such as nationalism, ideologies, scientism, and particularly secularism. However, this is not to say that man's ultimate questions of meaning and destiny have been satisfactorily answered by these new forces. To be sure, some men have given their loyalties to them while rejecting their traditional religions, but the final results are not yet in.

In the West the rise of the drug culture (often including an element of the occult or mystical) is but one immediate evidence of Western man's failure to find shalom. There is reason to believe that interest in the esoteric, novel, man-centered, self-saving religious efforts will continue as culture is subjected to still further changes. The challenge to the Christian is to regain his poise and proclaim—not his religion—but the living Christ with new clarity, conviction, and compassion.

Continuing Retreat from Institutionalized Religion

Notwithstanding the fact that people continue to need and search for satisfying religious experiences, an increasing number of people no longer have confidence that organized religion can provide the answers. First, the church has eroded her own credibility through too many wrong alliances and accommodation to worldly structures and powers.

In the United States the "separation" of church and state has not kept the church from benefiting from government patronage and government has, in turn, looked to the church for legitimation of attitudes and actions. Thus the church has gained an image of power and influence through a long association with the political, social, and economic realm. Instead of maintaining a position of integrity based on the biblical message, the church has become compromised by her alliances with worldly power. Rather than being identified with the dispossessed and powerless, the church esteemed her friendship with the powerful.

Second, misplaced values and the quest for worldly power have led to spiritual sterility. The purpose and message of the church will only be authenticated in lives changed by the impact of the gospel. If persons have truly felt the impact of the gospel and have been converted to Christ, practical changes in the way they live must necessarily follow. Such lively evidence will convince observers of the church's vitality.

A third reason for the rejection of organized religion is the bureaucratic bondage into which too much of the church has fallen. Organization and administration are necessary. However, not all problems will be solved by organizing a new committee or group. Some people react to problems created by bureaucracy by creating another bureaucracy! What is at stake is whether the church can take people seriously by organizing, where necessary, those responses which are needed to resolve problems.

The challenge to the church is to be open to the purging which is obviously required, knowing that only in this way will people be challenged to become part of the church.

Christian Population Will Decline

Christianity as a proportion of total world population will continue to decline while world population will soon reach six billion. Thus, it may fairly be assumed that Christians will be even more of a minority in the future — dramatically so in many countries of the Third World — than they have been in the past unless an unforeseen about-face in missionary vision and zeal occurs.

The city will be the dwelling place of 60 percent of the world's people by AD 2000. The phenomenal growth of cities around the world in the past two decades has already set the trend. The frustrations which people in the cities of the world will face in the near future will be frightening as they are forced to live in substandard conditions where crime and disease will multiply.

The challenge to the church is to come to terms with the city — the place where man's rebellion against God reaches its most extreme and concentrated forms. Many Christians will be living in metropolis. Will they symbolically, with Lot, abandon and flee from the city, or, with Christ, have profound compassion?

A Leveling-Off Within Missionary Movements

During the 1960s the total number of Protestant missionaries serving abroad continued to grow, but the last three years of the decade saw the start of a decline. The other significant clue is the increasing difficulty some missionary agencies are having in securing financial support. This is true not only for denominational boards, but non-denominational or interdenominational agencies as well.

There is another side to this concern, however. Around the world during the past 25 years there has been a growing nationalism and resentment of "help" from abroad. The church has been planted in many countries and communities, and local Christians are asking for greater independence and responsibility. Furthermore, many people are raising questions about the ease with which we sometimes feel concern for needy people far away but neglect needy neighbors near at hand.

The challenge to the church will be to continue meeting her Christian responsibility both at home and abroad. Instead of too easily concluding that fewer missionaries are needed, we should be asking what kind of people are required and set about releasing them for the very major tasks that remain to be done. Nothing less than a continuing sense of worldwide responsibility and concern is worthy of the church of Jesus Christ. The movement of the missionary "to the ends of the earth" will continue to be a primary symbol of the church universal.

Missions Barred in Some Countries

Today one third of the world's people live in countries which forbid the entry of foreign missionaries (and many of these would also prohibit open efforts to evangelize by nationals). Another block of countries are moving to restrict and perhaps eventually close off the entry of missionaries. The fact is that there has always been and there will continue to be much hostility to the proclamation of the gospel.

The challenge to the church is to "endure suffering as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" rather than losing her nerve or seeking to placate the "enemy of men's souls" by cheap
Rise, Then My Brothers*

Let us wait a little longer, brothers, For from the villages and towns around Will yet be those who join us On this journey. We'll wait for them. Among the few things of this world Which yet we have, time is our own. But what is time to those who Know not where they go or who Or what will let them in?

Take one last, long look, my brothers, At those which were our homes. The stacks of wood we cut to cheer The fires in our hearths will warm not us But others, when soon the winter snows Blow deep across these fields We lately plowed and sowed.

See there the men who claim the homes We built. To them already we're as much as dead. And Jesus rightly said we must forsake Our houses, lands, and friends if we would Fully follow Him in these dark days.

So that we will! Arise, my brothers, bless the day When persecution proved us all the Sons of God. No fear of death can stop the movement now. We've heard those shouts of victory from the fire, The songs of praise on lips of drowning saints. We've seen the blood of martyrs spilled By swords of evil men who knew not They were planting well in minds and hearts A whole new thing for God.

Arise with joy, my brothers, accept these hardships As a gift. We are a part of something great. We give an endless heritage to sons and daughters Yet unborn. We are the Anabaptists, first and free. We will that those who follow can tread proudly In brave footsteps we're about to make. Rise then, my brothers, for we shall now begin.

Discerning God’s New Thing

A theological wag once suggested that when Adam and Eve were driven out of the garden, Adam must have turned to Eve and said, “Honey, we are in a time of transition.” The children of Israel who found themselves in exile lamented, “How can we sing the Lord’s song in a strange land?” They hung their harps on the weeping willow trees and cried about their pitiful condition.

Yet another saw their situation with eyes of faith. He thundered God’s judgment on their deafness and their blindness to Himself, he crooned God’s comfort to this suffering people, and he called them to look around to see what God was doing. He quotes God as saying:

“Remember not the former things [the good old days], nor consider the things of old. Behold, I am doing a new thing; now it springs forth, do you not perceive it? I will make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert... I give water in the wilderness, rivers in the desert, to give drink to my chosen people, the people whom I formed for myself that they might declare my praise” (Is. 43:18-21).

In many ways all of us today, but religious people especially, are like exiles in a strange land or people in a desert. Our old ways are taken away from us, yet new stable ones have not emerged. We may even suspect that there may never be stable ways again.

In that kind of world faith brings new resources to bear. We look around and discover signs of hope and encouragement.

Few thinking people today can reject the need of our society, and we as persons in it, to repent, even if some might reject the theological frame of reference which speaks in those terms. If repentance is foundational for Christian faith and obedient living, then our current situation lends a great deal of encouragement.

Mennonite Board of Missions is continually affirming visions of God’s new thing emerging in many places and in many ways. In some situations it comes with a feeling of hurt at losing something treasured and meaningful. In other times and places it may mean working in uncomfortable situations or uncomfortable positions. These experiences give our efforts meaning, drive, purpose, and quiet excitement.

We particularly affirm our confidence in God’s new thing emerging in our brotherhood. This week a joint conference convenes at Yellow Creek Mennonite Church near Goshen, Ind., to talk about new structures and new ways for our life together as a brotherhood. We see new vitality, flexibility, commitment, and openness to brotherhood and witness at every age and organizational level. We sense new humility and new teachableness everywhere. New things begin in just such broken and contrite spirits.

We hope that this issue of Gospel Herald, just before Missions Week, November 1 through 8, may herald new faith and new eyes for seeing the new thing God is doing. Mission Board editors, Jim Bishop and John Bender, have worked with our various divisions to obtain some of these new dimensions of our programming. The programs themselves are not the new thing God is talking about in Isaiah, but we believe they may be harbingers of that new thing. — N.

Mission Is Meeting People

“Make disciples” is the command of the Great Commission. Disciple-making, or church extension, was the chief concern of the early church in the Book of Acts. It is my conviction that we need to capture anew this original and basic objective of mission. Disciple-making has lost its preeminence in what we call the mission of our church in the world today.

Feed the hungry, clothe the naked, relieve the distressed are central Christian obligations. The Mennonite Church stresses the importance of these Christian expressions through a large and widely varied program of social services to the needy and suffering people all over the world. Increasingly we as disciples of Jesus must be finding new ways of sharing and helping. We are still doing little in comparison with the affluence God has given us.

But social service is not in itself mission. It is an adjunct of mission; it sets the climate for mission; it serves as a foundation for mission. To call relief and service programs mission does not make them mission unless the Christian impact is followed through to a definite invitation and opportunity for expressing faith in Christ and for becoming His disciples.

Myron Augsburger, chairman of the all-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism, has expressed it effectively when he said, “The problems of the up’s are not to be solved by social action, nor by didactic noninvolvement. Anabaptist evangelism has always taken the more difficult way of calling men to faith in Christ which leads to neighborhood-loving social action. Either one without the other is not worthy of our highest calling in Jesus Christ.” — J. D. Graber
The Gospel in Secular Sounds

By Kenneth J. Weaver

Pinto. Anyone who thinks of a horse, go to the bottom of the class. At least, anyone in 1970 America. Pinto has become a mini-compact car — courtesy of radio, television, magazines, and billboards. This fact suggests that, for communications impact, modern mass media can rearrange our language in a matter of months.

Apollo. Mini-midi-maxi. Pollution. Words with new meaning because of mass communications.

Religion. "Turn to another station, John. Who needs that old-fashioned stuff?" New meaning? Not in religion that sounds like something from the forties.

To persons committed to Jesus Christ, religious sounding words have meaning. We have poured everyday-Christian living into them so that these "sounds" have become experience for us. But for the majority of Canadians and Americans today, religious broadcast terminology seems antique.

For everyday man, traditional religious broadcasts do not relate to his world, his problems. He turns them off because the religion he hears sounds like Model T '20s instead of Pinto '70s.

Yet moderns today are crying out for help and understanding. They sit in prisons of frustration today even as in Christ's day. If we are to tell them of new life and freedom in Christ, we need every new tool of communication. And we need to use them well.

Mennonite Broadcasts staff work imaginatively to put programs in understandable terms, in the language of the people. The Word becomes flesh, and walks among people today — through secular-sounding gospel broadcasts.

Choices to Make

Short weekday programming like Family Service Radio Spots, TV Spots — here is a sample from the new CHOICE series, now in production:

"You're driving your wife to a medical appointment, silently. You haven't been speaking — except when necessary. What happened? What could she see in that other man? You've rejected her explanations, her apology...."

This is the introduction to a three-minute CHOICE program. Dave Augsburger outlines several alternatives a man could take in such a situation. Then —

"To forgive, or not — is one of the most difficult and painful questions of life. And we're all caught by it. To overlook a situation may only encourage another in their painful way, and make matters worse. But to forgive, and help the other person to truly accept your forgiveness with respect, that is life.

"Forgive us our debts, even as we forgive our debtors," runs the prayer Jesus taught us. And He added, 'If we do not forgive, we will never be forgiven.' That was His way of saying it — but, it is your choice."

In Weekday Programming

Communicating the gospel in the midst of secular programming is not only an American situation. Short weekday programs in Spanish are putting the gospel where secular people will hear it. And in Japan a new television program is reaching homes the gospel has never penetrated before.

For years a traditional Japanese Mennonite Hour proclaimed the gospel in Hokkaido. But Japanese Mennonites were not satisfied. A 18-week experimental five-minute program now reaches Japanese housewives twice a week at 10:45 a.m. in the midst of daily routine. Mrs. Muira, a highly respected novelist and Christian, discusses family and community life from her own experience.

In the Family Livingroom

Dropped into baseball games and evening news shows, Family Life TV Spots demonstrate the Christ-life in a memorable way in the midst of secular programming.

Jesus Cares

Jesus cared enough to meet people where they were, in Galilee and Samaria, by the pool of Bethesda, even on the cross. Jesus wants us to meet people where they hurt today. They will understand His love and concern when they see Him demonstrated in our words and lives.
Scenes from “A Childhood to Remember,” a 1970 Family Life TV Spot selected by the NBC television network to be shown nationwide as a public service release. Over 500 television stations in the U.S. and Canada will show all three spots this season.

Johnny finds an old wasps’ nest. He wants to tell others.

God gave you your children to love.

Commitment

Nelson C. Shantz

One Faith,
One Mission

J. D. Graber

Prior to developing a personal definition of “mission,” mention of the word conjured up images of hysterical hypnosis in mass meetings and categorical civilizing of naked heathens. However, I have more recently been exposed to realities which have developed more immediate and personal concepts.

Mission may be simply offering a cup of cold water; it might be political dissent or the confronting of social evils like racism, inadequate housing. . . . It will include breaking down barriers between people— even you and me— and learning to be brothers. It will be a forthright and exuberant offering of the Christian alternative.

My specific mission presently is, first of all, developing— and continuing to develop—a relevant sense of mission, and second, applying it within the comparatively secure bounds of college. This is not to imply, however, that I visualize a great difference between this environment and what it will eventually be— “out there in the real world.” Rather, a sense of mission is part of a life-style springing from one’s Christian commitment, a commitment flexible enough to transcend minor environmental differences.

— Nelson C. Shantz, Edmonton, Alta., is a student at Goshen College. He served on the “Issues and Concerns Committee” at Mission ’70.

The distinction between home and foreign missions can no longer be made. Mission is mission whether it is undertaken across the street or across the seas. Actually, no real distinction should be made between mission and evangelism. The heart of the Great Commission is not the going but the making of disciples. In the original text “going” is a participation and not an imperative, and thus it is considered incidental to the central thrust of teaching and making disciples.

A new emphasis, although not a new concept in missions, is the centrality of winning people to faith in Christ, resulting in church extension. This may or may not imply extension of the established, organized church. A church is wherever believers are gathered with Jesus in the midst. Matthew 18:20.

In these days of increasing activity in social services we are apt to misconstrue service, calling it mission. The world’s massive human needs rightly draw on the heartstrings of the disciples of Jesus. More, rather than less, relief and service should be carried out by the church. But until man’s deepest need— his need of a Savior— has been met, our mission is not complete. — J. D. Graber, veteran missionary to India (1925-42) and church statesman, is former secretary for Overseas Mission with Mennonite Board of Missions. He now lives in Goshen, Ind.
Ministering Through Word and Song

When I hear the word "missions," I remember the words of Jesus through the prophet Isaiah: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound:"

"To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn;"

"To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified" (Is. 61:1-3).

This is my mission to be carried out in a ministry of song and teaching God's Word every opportunity I have at home and in the churches of God. — Barbara (Mrs. Leamon) Sowell, Maywood, Ill., is a pastor's wife and composer of biblically-oriented lyrics set to contemporary television themes. She has recorded an album entitled, "Be a Christian."

Relating to Peers

Missions to me is a very abstract yet very real part of the Christian life. It is abstract to the extent that God has put every human on this earth for a purpose (or mission), yet it is sometimes hard to discover precisely what that is. It is real because we have a choice whether to carry it out or to refuse.

I see my mission at this stage in life as a high school student to simply relate to other young persons. Youth have plenty of problems, and if I talk to them from a Christian point of view I might be able to offer positive help.

God has given me the ability to communicate easily with people. It is my responsibility as a Christian to carry out this mission. — Tom Meyers, Fountainville, Pa., is a member of the Doylestown Mennonite Church and served as youth representative to the Mission '70 program planning committee.

Missions Today

Going Where God Is Working

By Simon G. Gingerich

One of my seminary teachers once said that it is the business of missionary statesmen to determine where God is about to work and then go there with the program best suited for the situation.

My teacher was implying that there are both divine and human elements in successful evangelism and church extension. God is at work reaching unevangelized men and women with the gospel, establishing new churches, and helping Christians to grow in grace. God takes the initiative in mission strategy. Our human dilemma is to understand where and how God wishes to reach men with the gospel and develop new groups for fellowship and service.

In our brotherhood district missions leaders carry major responsibility for deciding where new fellowships emerge in the homeland. Recently I learned that one Indiana city has 16,000 Spanish-speaking newcomers largely without church relationships. An Illinois city has the largest concentration of Indian Americans in the country and there is almost no evangelical witness among them. I should tell the Indiana and Illinois mission leaders what I have learned about the migration of Spanish and Indian persons to these cities. Likewise you should tell your pastor and/or your district missions committee about local areas of need that God has laid upon your heart. District leaders believe that their supreme task is effective multiplication of the gospel message in receptive communities.

Mission leaders need to select from among all the possible locations those which should be given priority for church extension efforts. This is not always easy. Certain general principles usually prove helpful. The ratio of local churches to population in the area should be less than one church per 1,000 residents. Churches tend to divide their proffered services along societal rather than geographical lines. New churches tend to reach newcomers and particularly the residents of modern housing developments while older congregations tend to consist largely of senior citizens.

Once a group of people has been identified and it is determined that we believe God wants us to establish a church here, mission leaders need to tailor a program suitable for the time and place. Procedures, staff, facilities, and schedules depend upon the objectives and the planned program.

Mission and church extension committee members operate on the conviction that God has plans for churches to be established because people need Christ and fellowship.

Birth of a Group
Doing a New Thing

By John Bender

Nine youth, eight from Ontario Mennonite Conference and one from Western Ontario Conference, have organized as a singing group to travel, sing, and work in a number of areas in North America during the next year. The group has adopted the name Cherchez-Vivre, which means "search to live."

In September 1970 Cherchez-Vivre completed Voluntary Service orientation at Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., and began their first assignment in Durham, N.C. For six to eight weeks the group will do community service — conducting a crafts, music, and recreation program for children at Northbrook Community Center. They will also supervise cooking and sewing classes, sing at a veterans hospital as well as in other hospitals, and in coffeehouses. The group will work in conjunction with the Durham Mennonite Fellowship.

Cherchez-Vivre members see this venture as: a challenge to Christian living, discovering what it means to be "church"; a chance to share themselves through music — "practicing what we sing about," as several members stated; and an exposure to the honest scrutiny of group living, developing tolerance, understanding, and knowledge of what it means to be part of a community. Cherchez-Vivre members anticipate the year's experience to be "a real help to what we can do for the rest of our lives."

How did Cherchez-Vivre begin? One year ago in October the youth heard a visiting Campus Crusade for Christ group sing at the University of Waterloo in Waterloo, Ontario. The idea struck a responsive chord. Cherchez-Vivre would stay together as a musical group to travel and work on a self-support basis for one year. The group had formed in the spring of 1969 for a six-week joint Ontario-Western conference MYF project of contacting youth groups to hear and see what MYF-ers were thinking and saying.

Their parents' response to the idea of traveling and singing for a year was not particularly characterized by overt enthusiasm, yet they expressed an openness to the Cherchez-Vivre idea. Especially did they try to understand the possibilities of the proposed venture.

On a Thursday night in December the group met with

Doug Snyder, Mennonite Central Committee director for Ontario. Doug helped the group see the complications as well as the possibilities for carrying out a traveling music and work ministry.

The following day Andy McDowell and Gary Leis left to attend Mennonite Youth Council, meeting in Chicago. Andy was representing the Ontario MYF as its president and Gary the Western Ontario MYF. In Chicago Andy and Gary had only a few minutes to discuss the idea of Cherchez-Viøre with Ray Horst, secretary of Relief and Service at Mennonite Board of Missions and with Art Smoker, secretary of Youth Ministries for the Mennonite Church. The encouragement in this brief meeting was enough to carry Cherchez-Viøre through four more months of planning.

In January 1970 the group met with their parents. Hesitation was evident: What type of music was the group intending to play? How would the venture be financed? What about living arrangements? Who could the group relate to? What areas would be visited? Would the girls be safe? The resolution of this meeting was the feeling expressed by the parents: “If you feel this is your calling we won’t stop you.”

In mid-April Kenneth Seitz, Jr., director of In-Service Training at Mennonite Board of Missions, and Art Smoker met with the group in Ontario to explore possible relationships, programming, and implementation of the Cherchez-Viøre idea. On a Friday night and all day Saturday the group talked, planned, and prayed.

The Saturday meeting was held in the Wellesley, Ont., Community Center. The last session of the day was the second parents meeting with the Cherchez-Viøre group. Through the questions and response percolated an understanding, clarification, and shaping of plans; a sense of anticipation in “doing” emerged in the meeting. A different way of expressing and being the church was being planned. Each parent recognized the difference in form; but beyond the questions, discussion, and prayers emerged a common enthusiasm for an unfamiliar way of witness and service. It was an ebullient moment. It was a moment of commitment and thanksgiving. The Spirit of the Lord was upon the group making Himself large in the attitudes, concerns, and commitment of those present.

Now Cherchez-Viøre was ready to make its final decision. Some still had to weigh whether to give up a pending scholarship, whether to finish university first, or whether to wait for any other reason. The group wanted to raise their own finances—a major part of it by June 1. One person decided not to participate. Another person decided to go, and found out later that her scholarship could be deferred for one year. The group started raising money. The June 1 decision to launch Cherchez-Viøre had been made.

Between April and June 1 the group raised $8,000 for their support. Much of this came from team members and their parents. Friends interested in the venture have since contributed $2,000 through the Ontario Conference Treasurer. Anticipated overall cost for the year’s venture is $15,000.

Ken Seitz terms the project “unique” in that it was proposed and largely planned and financed by the Cherchez-Viøre group. “This is a new thing for VS,” he said. “The idea of VS and VS units has been pulling people together for a common purpose from different communities and backgrounds. These individuals were a group before they came.”

Future projects and activities proposed for Cherchez-Viøre include reconstruction in the Hurricane Celia-devastated area of south Texas around Corpus Christi; attending Urbana 70, the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship Convention at Urbana, Ill.; a coffeehouse and youth ministry in Sarasota, Fla.; and a project in Montreal.

The experiment is not without problems and uncertainties, but in the process and in similar resources being offered to the church by other groups it can mean as Ken stated, “A new lease on life for the VS program.”

A Denominational Dream

I borrow that phrase from another source which said that part of our problem of growth is that we have no denominational dream, and so we have been carrying on one of two things in most of our congregations—a maintenance program or a defense operation to survive.

At the very time our world situation is literally begging for salt and light, we seem to be paralyzed like the boy who had the unlikely experience of swallowing a bird’s egg whole. He was afraid to move lest it break; and afraid not to move lest it hatch. It is reported that a policeman said to a group of loiterers, “If you’re gonna stand around here, you’ve gotta keep moving.” Those are prophetic words for the church of the ’70s.

I think the denominational dream must be evangelism. Anything short of reproduction will fail. — Richard C. Detweiler in Conference address.
One Test of Compassion

By John Powell

Compassion is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "sympathy or sorrow or pity excited by the distress or misfortunes of another." However, compassion in the biblical sense implies mercy whereby Christian grace is very strongly urged toward all men. It is further defined as "the disposition of love respecting the suffering and the needs of individuals."

One is apt to say that the former definition is secular while the latter is religious. One suggests a surface recognition of humanity while the other stresses love for humanity. Therefore, compassion can either be a surface expression or it can be a deeply moving experience in which one totally empathizes with the agonies and pains of God's greatest creation. As a Christian brotherhood and as a caring church, where do we stand in comparing the verbal versus active expressions of compassion?

The Minority Ministries Council, along with other Mennonite agencies, has been trying to interpret the Compassion Fund to the constituency. However, I would say that either the constituency has not been really listening to what has been said, or like Pharaoh, we have hardened our hearts to the point of apathy. We have heard of and read about the Compassion Fund, its uses, and what it means to become more involved in the needs of our fellowmen. Some have responded. However, many who could respond have not.

The Compassion Fund, in its original genius, was to provide a financial base of approximately $500,000 per year for the next five years as an expression of total brotherhood and commitment to those less fortunate. This is based on an above-budget gift of $6 per Mennonite Church member per year. As of the 1970 Mission Board meeting in Lansdale, $52,000 had been accumulated in the Compassion Fund at Elkhart. This represents approximately 80¢ per member. Since then, the Compassion Fund has risen to $67,000. However, we are far short of the expected total contributions and the amount of funds needed to finance projects to which we have designated funds.

The Minority Ministries Council has designated $97,000 in projects to date. We are now moving ahead in funding these projects as money becomes available. We have already provided $20,000 for summer programs in urban Mennonite churches which has been reported through various church-related periodicals.

It is interesting to note that of the $97,000 designated to projects, only $16,000 were designated to projects outside the Mennonite Church. This means that our Mennonite churches submitted programs which are quite significant and merited priority for Compassion Funds. Projects receiving funds are as follows:

1. Project MAME — a program designed to provide medical care for migratory farm laborers in a six-county area in Northern Indiana.
2. South Texas Youth Ministry provides personnel and programming for individuals and group ministry to Spanish-speaking youth in south Texas.
3. First Mennonite Church, Brooklyn, N.Y., operates a program to help the Spanish Mennonite congregation in the Bronx find personnel to carry out its ministry in the community.
4. Chicago Mennonite Team Ministry works to provide a year-round cross-cultural experience in Chicago and in a camp setting at Youth Village, White Pigeon, Mich.
5. Alice, Texas, Youth Center offers an intensive recreational, religious, and leadership training program for Spanish-speaking youth in Alice, Texas.
6. Jeff-Vander-Lou Housing renovates ghetto housing in St. Louis, Mo., in cooperation with the Bethesda Mennonite Church.

Two patrons examine the sign welcoming them to the Rancho Alegre Youth Center in Alice, Tex., one of several programs that qualify as Compassion Fund recipients.

7. United Mexican-American Organization, South Bend, Ind., provides monies for Mexican-Americans in South Bend to work at eradicating discrimination through long-range programs which will strengthen fair relations with local employers, homeowners, and schools.

8. Indiana University book-scholarship program provides book scholarships for black students who attend IU Medical School in Indianapolis.

9. Twight Farmers Coop in Tutwiler, Miss., is jointly sponsored by the Minority Ministries Council and MCC to provide management for a newly established cooperative in Mississippi.

Bound to Servanthood

By Luke Birky

For the serious follower of Christ the question that determines whether one cares about his neighbor, shares with those in need, or serves others, is: "What are the gifts that I possess and how can they be used most effectively?"

Christ's words and acts clearly point out that to be human is to care about and "do for" others. To be Christlike one will love and perform acts of mercy even for his enemies. The servanthood stance taken by Christ is expected of His followers.

Another important question to consider is how to synchronize my gifts with the gifts and efforts of other members of the body of Christ. It seems important to take these into account to allow all parts of the body to complement the efforts of other members. This is important at both the intradenominational and the interdenominational level.

Another aspect meriting careful consideration involves what society is doing to meet needs. In several areas the church has led the way by developing programs to meet certain crucial human needs and by prodding society at large to do the same.

How does all this concern the Health and Welfare Division of Mennonite Board of Missions? This program—consisting of general hospitals, retirement and nursing homes, and programs for handicapped and needy children and youth —developed as concerned church members saw needs and visualized how these could be met by mobilizing available resources. The gifts and skills of many people in the Mennonite Church and beyond are, therefore, united in a great team effort.

But what of the future? Technology continues to advance. Society in general, through community and government action, is becoming more concerned about the needs of individuals requiring specialized care. Mennonites are becoming more urbanized and mobile, and an increasing number are entering the professions. Some young people are questioning the viability of the church, while others are relating to it on a less provincial basis than in the past.

Although the Minority Ministries Council has not received sufficient contributions to fund all programs, we are moving ahead in funding them in faith that the constituency will respond positively. Other projects are worthy of funding. However, we cannot disburse more funds simply because they are not available.

The Minority Ministries Council believes the Compassion Fund is "a voice of Christ speaking in a distorted world." You have the will and the resources to make this voice speak louder. What is your response? Sympathy or apathy? Surface involvement or a deeper sharing of your total faith? Only you, with God listening in, can answer that.

Luke Birky is secretary of Health and Welfare with Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart.

Health and Welfare and Voluntary Service join forces at several locations across the United States. At Maple Lawn Homes in Eureka, Ill., VS personnel function in various medical and maintenance roles. Here VS-er Carl Miller, Pryor, Okla., adjusts a patient's table in preparation for mealtime. VS-ers also share with patients on an individual basis beyond regular working hours.

There is also an increasing awareness of ways in which society has been insensitive to the hurts of some people—such as minority groups, the poor, the handicapped, the offender. There is also increasing awareness of the sometimes devastating effects of forced retirement and of the heavy toll of alienation from God and others for various reasons.

Health and Welfare personnel desire to find ways to better serve and to be open to move into new areas of ministry. The Health and Welfare Committee, in collaboration with program administrators of the various institutions, is presently involved in intensive study to clarify needs and goals and to find better methods of serving. The Jesus way is servanthood; we have no choice but to serve need.
Needed: A “New Nonconformity”

By Conrad G. Brunk

There has been much talk about the “Recovery of the Anabaptist Vision” or the “Return to the New Testament Church.” What do we mean by these expressions? Are they expressions of a church struggling to preserve itself and its distinctive cultural heritage, or are they prophetic calls to a new sense of mission and purpose in the church which will again make it a profound force in history? The future of the church hangs on this alternative.

It is this question that faces you graduating seniors today. Are you destined to settle into the comfortable pew of mere tradition, or are you going to be in the front lines of the Christian witness, meeting the issues which the world is confronting and making an impact in those issues?

You will be among those who will decide the fate of the church in the coming decade. By your understanding of the mission of the church and your interpretation of its ideals and values you will decide whether the church is to be merely an institution or a dynamic agent in the course of history.

A Step Forward

The power of the Christian church in the past has been its ability to constantly break out of the encumbrances of its tradition and to recapture the basic ideals and values of its heritage in a new way. It has always been subject to “institutionalism,” but a new and powerful church has always arisen out of the ashes of the dying one.

This is the task that faces the church in every age. It is the task which faces you here today. Can the “Recovery of the Anabaptist Vision” be for us, not a step backward into the isolation of the past, but can it be rather, a step forward into the new age — an affirmation of the past for the future?

It is precisely this kind of feeling which gave power and impetus to the radical, Anabaptist wing of the Reformation. The Anabaptists captured the spirit of their age so powerfully that their enemies were forced to concede that “the more of them we kill, the greater becomes their number.” The Anabaptists were successful because they were able to effect that welding together of the past and the future which speaks forcefully in the present.

Their watchword was that of “returning” to the New Testament ideal of the church, but their message was not a retreat from their situation. It broke out of the conventional forms of Christianity and presented a way of life that spoke to the needs of the sixteenth century. It gave a new understanding to the whole concept of the “world,” over against the “church,” which broke through all the sham and compromise of the state church. The Anabaptists breathed a new life into the Christian tradition which made an indelible mark in the course of history. They took an old idea and gave it a new sense, a new meaning in their time. They took the ideal of “humility” out of the medieval monastery and put it at the center of life. They took the concept of Christian love out of the realm of mere hope of a world to come, and affirmed it as a present reality. They understood the “kingdom of God” not as a Christianized society over against a pagan one, but as a fellowship of committed men and women in the brotherhood of Christ. In short, the Anabaptists took the ideals of their Roman heritage and gave them a new concrete realization that revolutionized their world.

Who Breathes New Life Today?

But what of the church today? Has the Reformation been effected once and for all? Not as long as history moves on — and there is no question about its movement today. Who is to recover the vision for us today? Who is to breathe new life into our heritage? What is the concrete realization of our heritage today that will turn our world upside down? This is a challenge that I submit to those of you who graduate here today. Can you help the church discover anew the meaning of its tradition in our time?

I submit the thesis that the Anabaptist-Mennonite heritage of this college and of most of you who graduate has in its distinctive heritage some of the most valuable guidelines for a Christian response to the issues of the 70s. That is, if we can resuscitate these guidelines and give them a concrete manifestation that can again provide a prophetic voice for our time.

Many of these values sound outmoded and hackneyed to you, precisely because they have lost their motivating power

Conrad G. Brunk served the past two years as instructor in philosophy at Eastern Mennonite College. He will serve the next two years as assistant director of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors in Washington, D.C. This is Part 2 of his baccalaureate address at Eastern Mennonite College, May 24, 1970.
I would be the last one to argue that dress patterns and similar external concerns are the criterion of true nonconformity. It is clear that the old form of nonconformity in mere outward appearance can no longer revitalize the church today — to return to it or to attempt to preserve the old forms would lead us to a certain institutional death.

What is far more important, however, is the fact that our new conformism is symptomatic of a general trend in the church toward a lack of sensitivity to the injustices that are a part of our way of life.

The real seriousness of our loss of nonconformity is not in the loss of one peculiar style of dress or another, but rather it is the evidence that we have accepted the values of the "world" as normative for us as Christians.

Active Nonconformism

I challenge you to rediscover for your age the meaning of a new nonconformity. Nonconformity in our age must be an active nonconformism that does not grow out of a sentimental adherence to mere tradition, but out of a re- renewed sensitivity to the needs of the world around us. The Christian is called to be an active witness to his world by his nonconformity — a witness that breaks through all the facades and niceties by which a society covers over its evils.

A "new nonconformity" cannot be the principle of "die Stille im Lande," or "the quiet in the land" which long has characterized the Mennonite Church. In our day the "quiet church" cannot possibly be the witnessing church. Perhaps this principle has served to preserve the identity of the church in the past, in times of severe persecution.

But it is no longer a viable option for us today. Nonconformity in our age must entail an active witness in our society. It is time for us to become "the noisy in the land." If we become true nonconformists today, it will inevitably bring us into conflict with our culture. We will stand out as a testimony against its injustices, its hate and violence, and its plastic values. Perhaps we will be able to discover once again what it means to be "pilgrims and strangers."

A "new conformism" cannot be an isolated subculture of Christians deciding to wear the same kind of uniform, or to be different merely to be different. It must reject conformism in all its forms where it obscures the witness of the gospel in the world, whether that conformism be legislated by the world or by a religious subculture.

Paul makes it very clear in the opening verses of Romans 12 that true nonconformity is the ability of the Christian to keep his head clear of the confused and evil values of the world, for he says, "Adapt yourselves no longer to the pattern of this present world, but let your minds be remade and your whole nature thus transformed. Then you will be able to discern the will of God, and to know what is good, acceptable, and perfect."*

Paul's point is clear: when the Christian becomes conformed to the world around him, he becomes insensitive to the will of God — the "good, acceptable, and perfect" — for that society. Or, as Jesus put it in our opening passages he makes "God's law null and void out of respect for his tradition." How many of us here who pay lip service to nonconformism have accepted our basic cultural mores as God's law and "teach as doctrines the commandments of men"?

A revaluation of nonconformity is sorely needed in our church today so that our minds may be remade and we may again be able to discern the will of God in our times, in our present circumstances.

Mennonite General Conference Reports

By Howard J. Zehr

Many readers of the Gospel Herald are likely eager for a report from the office of Mennonite General Conference in light of the editorial by John Drescher in the July 14 issue of the Gospel Herald entitled, "General Conference Need Is Immediate." The title selected by Brother Drescher is very fitting not only for the particular crisis situation of the Mennonite General Conference treasury, but it reflects the situation as it is. The needs of Mennonite General Conference have always been immediate. It owns no property, it has no assets other than its confidence in the brotherhood. Most of its office space and equipment are rented. Its existence concretely symbolizes the pilgrim nature of the church. Its continuing ministry is constantly dependent upon the faithful, consistent, and regular support of the brotherhood. This does require a sincere confidence in the brotherhood on the part of those whose commitment calls them to this kind of vocation.

The response to the moderator's editorial is heartening. Conferences, congregations, and individuals have rallied to this call. The last report from Treasurer Rudy indicates that receipts for the first two and a half months of the second year of the biennium were greatly improved. The month of August brought very good receipts from the brotherhood. However, we have not yet recovered sufficiently from the earlier decline in receipts, and the monthly cost of operation as approved in the budget is $11,667. If the constituency will regularly and faithfully support, we can carry forth the assignments given us and pay the indebtedness.

A number of letters came to us in response to the editorial. All of these, with only one exception, were positive, encouraging, and heartwarming. For instance, we know of a widow who contributed $100. A pastor and his wife sent us a check of $400. One young couple who have spent most of their years thus far in training or in VS-type assignments sent a check of $50. The latter sent a letter of genuine concern. It said in part, "It is the creative efforts of the church leaders in these areas that keep us from giving up completely. . . . We feel that here is the best hope for the Spirit of God to speak to our brotherhood of concern for Him, for each other, and for His world. . . . Please don't quit pushing, searching for ways to be a real fellowship of believers." I confess that I had to read this one with moist eyes.

Might we be approaching a time in our history when the young people of the church and the younger couples of our church must prod their elders for further probing and greater faithfulness in perpetuating the Christian faith and interpreting its meaning? Could it be that we, the middle-aged and older members, are becoming a bit weary?

Our young people are looking to us to continue furnishing leadership for a church which they believe in more than ever before. The testimonies coming out of the experience of the recent Youth Convention at Lake Junaluska both encourage, challenge, and convict this church leader. One of the best attended seminars was on the future of the Mennonite Church. There are reports that many young persons came to new levels of Christian commitment. Some found new direction for life vocations. More than ever I have become concerned that we who are in present leadership and those of us who have currently committed to us resources for carrying forward the work of the church be found faithful; and that we view ourselves in a Christian partnership. The young people have a right to expect us to furnish the quality of leadership and make available resources and contexts for their stimulation and Christian growth. Mennonite General Conference endeavors to do this for all age levels. I would therefore call upon the members of the Mennonite Church to stand with us in this ministry. Unfortunately, any real cutback in the work and programs of Mennonite General Conference have a delayed effect. Committee members and staff persons have assignments committed to them. It becomes frustrating and sometimes even disheartening when they do not find ample support of the brotherhood to carry these to completion. Your continuing regular support of the work of Mennonite General Conference is your vote in favor of the church's ministry. Can we count on you?

MCC Director Reports from Amman, Jordan

"There is an acute shortage of food in Amman," Urbane Peachey, Mennonite Central Committee director for Jordan, who was able on Sept. 29 and 30 to enter Amman, the capital city (where the fighting was worst), reported that some areas are "severely damaged."

In response to the urgent needs of the people in Jordan who are undergoing yet another disaster of war and suffering, MCC has sent $10,000 in emergency relief funds.

A plan for rapid food distribution has been worked out in cooperation with other agencies who are also contributing funds. Biscuits, rice, sugar, butter, canned meats and fish, tea, and coffee are to be purchased in Europe and flown into Amman. The first flight was planned for Oct. 3.

A second stage of MCC relief will be distribution of blankets and clothing. It is too early to evaluate the amount of clothing and the number of blankets which will be needed, but Peachey reported that it is already getting cold in Amman, and the need for new dark heavy weight blankets will certainly be acute in a short time.

All but one of the Palestinian and Jordanian MCC staff in Jordan are accounted for and well. The warehouse where supplies were stored appears to have been broken into, although no further investigation was possible. In the area where MCC offices are located there were many broken windows, damage to walls, and general looting.

Though some of the refugee camps around Amman were heavily damaged by the fighting, the Marka and Talbieh camps where MCC has been concentrating its efforts had lighter damages.

Peachey plans to return to Amman with the first flight of relief food. He will continue to keep in touch with the Akron offices as relief efforts continue.

Hopefully the new emergency relief programs will be needed only a few months. The $10,000 sent now is only the first installment. Additional funds will be required soon for purchase of blankets, supplies, and possibly for food.

Contributions for Jordan relief may be channeled through the conference offices or sent directly to MCC offices at 201-1483 Pembina Highway, Winnipeg 19, Manitoba, or 21 South 12th St., Akron, Pa. 17501.

Second Peace Section Assembly Announced

On Nov. 19-21 the Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section will sponsor a second annual convocation for the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ brotherhood. This year the theme is the meaning of "Shalom" in a militarized society. Meeting at Hotel Dyckman, Minneapolis, Minn., the assembly will be a place to share experiences and insights into what constitutes a faithful biblical nonresistance, explore the violence and hostility that characterize our time, and find the mind of Christ on issues of war and peace.

John H. Redekop of Waterloo Lutheran University and author of The American Far Right will open the assembly with his 1970 S. F. Coffman Lecture, "How Should Christians Make Political Decisions?"

The rest of the conference will follow a pattern of topical addresses followed by a relevant Bible study. These will be the basis for group discussions. Among those on the program are: Victor Adrian, President of Mennonite Brethren Bible College; C. Norman Kraus, Goshen College; John K. Stoner, Brethren in Christ pastor from Harrisburg, Pa.; Donald Kaufman, a General Conference pastor from Mountain Lake, Minn.; and Elaine S. Rich, North Newton, Kan., a recently elected member of the MCC Peace Section. Students appearing on the program include Ernie Dick, Ottawa, Canada; Harlan Unrau, Downey, Calif.; Ruth Stoltzfus, Harrisonburg, Va.; and Ellen Kroeker, Hillsboro, Kan. Topics to be discussed will be "The Warfare State," "God-Country-Flag," "Who Are the Enemies?" and "Forms of Peace Action." "Shalom" will be studied as vision, mission, love, and action.

Special group rates are available for lodging. Reservations for the conference and requests for the complete conference program should be made by Nov. 5 through the MCC Peace Section, 21 South 12th St., Akron, Pa. 17501.

"Change" Is Mission Forum Topic

Central to the experience of Christian mission is change. "He must increase, but I must decrease," John the Baptist said of Jesus. "I must go away so that the Spirit may come," Jesus told His disciples.

David Shank, missionary to Belgium, will explore some current implications of this experience for Mennonites during the first Mission Forum sponsored by Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind. The forum will be held on successive Saturdays from Nov. 15 through Dec. 5 in four population centers of the Mennonite Church.

The forum has been titled: "Refocusing Our Mission: Flexibility, Mobility, and Dispensability." Shank is returning to the States expressly to participate in the forum. Some congregations in each area will have opportunity to hear Shank and other staff members on Sunday morning following each Saturday session. Students at Eastern Mennonite, Harrisonburg, and Goshen colleges will also hear and exchange views with Shank during his scheduled appearances on campus.

The four forum locations are Harrisonburg, Va.; Archbold, Ohio; Bloomington, Ill.; and Harrisonburg, Kan. Coordinators for local arrangements in the respective areas are Norman Derstine, C. C. Schrock, Harold Zehr, and James Hersherberger. H. Ernest Bennett, Board Secretary, and Wilbert Shenk, Secretary for Overseas Missions, will also participate in the forum.

The forum is to provide a pattern for mutual exchange of views and concerns. Each session will last about five hours, with some breaks and a meal together. Groups will sing together, as well as talk and listen. Persons attending will pay for their meal; no offering will be taken.

David Shank, primary forum resource, has been a missionary in Belgium with Mennonite Board of Missions for 20 years. During that time he has had a great deal of opportunity to participate in many kinds of Christian mission activity and witness ranging from social service to direct proclamation of the gospel. He has served as pastor for several congregations during this time.

Boyd Nelson, Board staff member coordinating the arrangements, points out that "Dave thinks deeply, penetrates to the center of issues, and operates within an Anabaptist perspective of missions. He is a live, vital speaker who consistently challenges audiences."

Forum purposes call for exploring broad issues of missions philosophy and experience rather than fund-raising. Attendance is being limited so that more congregations can be represented and participants can eat and fellowship together more informally in give-and-take dialogue.

"We see the demand for flexibility, mobility, and dispensability in Christian mission as universal today," Wilbert Shenk comments. "We believe that a consultation of this kind with key people in congregations broadly scattered throughout the church can be beneficial both in our mission overseas and at home. Dave Shank can help us particularly in seeing our mission through the perspective of our Anabaptist heritage."

Linds Receive Award

While attending an Eastern Mennonite College Alumni Association banquet in Salem, Ore., on Oct. 2, Myron S. Augsburger, president of EMC, presented an honorary award to Lloyd and Mary Lind of Salem, the parents of 11 children who have attended EMC.

President Augsburger praised the Linds for providing the home atmosphere of responsibility and spiritual values that inspired 11 of their 14 children to attend EMC.

Having been married for 40 years, the Linds raised their children during the empty Depression years. Running the farm was a major operation and the children learned early that when Dad was around, monkeyshines weren't.

"One thing I tried to drill into them all was responsibility — they just had to assume responsibility," said Mr. Lind. Any of the 14 will gladly testify to the abundance of hard work and responsibility.

Record Produced for Missions Week

Missions Week '70 will focus on "God's New Thing" (Isa. 43) and new things in the Mennonite Church. Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., also is doing a new thing by producing a small, disposable record with a three-minute message recorded by H. Ernest Bennett, Board Executive Secretary. The Board asks that congregations play the record in their Sunday morning services just before and during Missions Week observances, Nov. 1-8.

The record replaces the traditional Missions Week folder that combined the appeals of both general and district boards. The key for this approach rests in a decision taken by district mission leaders on the recommendation of Ivan Kauffmann, then Secretary of Information Services for the Board. At that time they decided to resort to district papers and Gospel Herald for Missions Week '70 publicity in an effort to cut costs and simplify patterns of cooperation.

A number of district boards are using district publications for their emphases. One or two districts are preparing special folders, two or three have scheduled bulletin inserts, and at least one has planned a conference-wide rally.

Jim Bishop and John Bender of Mennonite Board of Missions at Elkhart have prepared 12 pages for Gospel Herald Oct. 20 issue reflecting values and concerns of several Board divisions. The record and copies of the text for use in congregations, replacing the traditional folder, should be available by the third week in October.

"I discovered some interesting information when I began preparing that message," Ernest Bennett says. "Two out of every 100 members of our church are serving somewhere in the world with one of our mission boards or relief and service agencies. We can take a great deal of satisfaction from that figure, but we must also recognize the responsibility that this places on us as a brotherhood to support them morally, prayerfully, and financially."

Films Recommended for Missions Week

In conjunction with Missions Week '70 observances to be held Nov. 1-8 in many Mennonite congregations across North America, the audiovisuals department at Mennonite Board of Missions suggests several films titles that relate to this year's emphasis on "God's New Thing," based on Isaiah 43. (Missions Week publicity is focusing on new forms of evangelism and service programming at Mennonite Board of Missions.)

Beggar at the Gates, a 56-minute color motion picture produced by WBZ-TV in Boston, covers a broad range of religious concepts and activities from the most conservative to some startling variants not expected within established Protestant and Catholic bodies. As a study in contrasts, traditional services are placed in juxtaposition to new forms of worship. The film carries a $25 rental (subsidized rental, $15). A New Thing, produced by Faith at Work, encourages spiritual renewal through personal involvement in home church, business, and community needs. The viewer receives candid glimpses of renewal as men and women from all walks of life tell frankly and openly what they are discovering in Christ and His church. A New Thing, 34 minutes in sound and color, is available with a $22.50 rental.

Photographed from still pictures, The Church in the World uses symbolism, a folk-jazz song, and narration to provide the viewer with a three-dimensional experience: confrontation as he is asked, "Brother, where are you?" commitment as he is asked to respond to world hunger and loneliness; and celebration as he realizes that he is the church — the answer to confusion, pain, and fear. A Kairos film, 24 minutes in black and white, The Church in the World is available for $20 rental; subsidized, $14.

God Owns My Business, a recent Ken Anderson production in color, provides examples of what can happen when a man takes his faith at face value and turns his business, with annual profits running into six figures, over to God. The true story of Stanley Tam presents Christian stewardship in a new and exciting perspective for modern laymen. Rental: $30; subsidized, $20.

Prints of these films especially recommended for Missions Week '70 are available from Audiovisuals, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Richard Keeler
Going to Trinidad

"The needs of people in the United States are urgent, but the physical and spiritual needs in Trinidad are even more pressing" is Dr. Richard Keeler's explanation of his decision to serve in that island country as a physician under the American Leprosy Mission program. Trinidad lies just off the coast of Venezuela, South America, and the Keelers expect to arrive there with their four daughters by early 1971.

Born near Philadelphia, Pa., Keeler spent most of his younger life in northern Minnesota where his parents served as lay workers with the Northern Light Gospel Mission. In 1956 he began studying at Eastern Mennonite College in Harrisonburg, Va., and graduated in 1960 with a degree in chemistry and biology. Also in 1960 he married Martha Risser of Harrisonburg and entered medical school at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

After earning his MD degree, Keeler started his general practice residency in Norfolk, Va., but after three months Selective Service required him to enter alternate service. He accepted a Volunteer Service assignment under the Mennonite Central Committee and served as medical director for a county health department in Whitesburg, Ky.

After satisfying the Selective Service obligations the Keelers decided to remain in Kentucky for a while. During the next two years there they learned from the Virginia Mennonite Mission Board of the needs in Trinidad. Eventually they also learned of the specific need for medical help for leprosy victims.

At the invitation of the American Leprosy Mission, Dr. Keeler attended a seminar at the leprosy treatment center in Carville, La. This seminar was the "turning point" for him. After meeting so many doctors who were genuinely concerned for the physical and spiritual needs of unfortunate leprosy victims, he decided he wanted to work with this kind of group.

In Aug. 1969 Keeler with his family moved from Kentucky to Baltimore, Md., for an additional year of study in Medical Administration at Johns Hopkins University. He also took courses in leprosy treatment and tropical medicine. While in Baltimore a fourth daughter was born to the Keelers.

For nearly two years Mennonite Broadcasts has been airing the Way to Life program on a radio station in Port of Spain, Trinidad. But all follow-up work had to be done through the Jamaica office since no workers are stationed in Trinidad. Dr. Keeler saw this as an opportunity to become involved with the spiritual needs of people on the island, and he volunteered to take on this responsibility. For several weeks during July and August he spent time in the Home Bible Studies department at Mennonite Broadcasts learning the grading and counseling system. Home Bible Studies will be a major part of his follow-up work.

Keeler believes that public relations may be his most difficult task in working with leprosy patients. "There is such a fear of the disease that many victims are isolated from society and often considered dead, even by relatives," he said. "People must learn that leprosy is not dangerous when treated properly. By allowing leprosy patients to remain in society they can keep their jobs and their self-respect and their families can stay together."

In August this year Dr. Keeler traveled to Ethiopia to study under ALERT, the All-Africa Leprosy Rehabilitation and Training program. Upon returning in December he will be familiar with the most modern techniques of prevention and treatment of leprosy. He speaks of the ALERT program as the ideal preparation for his work in Trinidad.

"This work offers a unique opportunity, to show that we do not divorce our concern for people who have leprosy from Jesus Christ's acceptance of all people," Dr. Keeler added.

Youth Council Decides on Another Convention

The next North American Mennonite Youth Convention will be held in 1973.

That was a decision of the Youth Council of the Mennonite Church which held its annual fall meeting in Chicago Sept. 25-27. Youth Council, composed of about 40 district conference youth secretaries and youth representatives, meets twice each year.

In a historic first for the Council, this fall's meeting had several conjoint sessions with the Young People's Union of the General Conference Mennonite Church, also meeting in Chicago the same weekend. The joint sessions were ones of sharing and worshiping together.

In the Friday evening session Youth Council members shared their experiences at Convention 70 with members of YPU. The joint discussion was held to help the council in its evaluation of the Convention 70 experience and to give the YPU counsel in its plans for a General Conference youth convention in Fresno, Calif., next summer.

Saturday morning the combined youth groups discussed the goal of working with young people and how that goal is reached. Honesty, commitment to Christ, and reconciliation were considered as goals with the intimate relationships of personal encounters and small groups identified as primary facilitators toward reaching these goals.

Bob Carlson, chaplain of the Prairie View Hospital, Newton, Kan., led the participants in various group process activities and also in two worship experiences.

In their separate session Youth Council members also made several other decisions in addition to the one to hold another youth convention in 1973:

— Mennonite youth will participate in a 1971 interdenominational quiz from the Book of Matthew. An all-star team selected from all participating district conference teams will represent the Mennonite Church at the international competitions next summer.

— Regional leadership training conferences will be held in 1971 for adults working with young people. In several areas these will also include adults from General Conference Mennonite churches.

— More attention needs to be given to work with young adults beyond high school age. This is particularly true for those who are in CPS but also for those who are not.

— In spite of the debt incurred with the last exchange, intercontinental youth exchanges are meaningful experiences and should be continued in the future.

— The meeting with the General Conference YPU was helpful. Perhaps another such meeting of youth leaders could be expanded to include representatives from more Mennonite groups.

Hostetter Heads GC Drive

Abram M. Hostetter, medical director of Philhaven Hospital, of Lebanon, Pa., and a resident of R. 1, Annville, has been appointed national chairman of the 1971 Alumni Fund for Goshen College.

A 1953 graduate of GC, Hostetter will head efforts to raise funds from alumni between now and next June 30 to help meet operating needs of the school. The fund is conducted annually by the alumni association in cooperation with the staff and faculty of the college. Last year more than 2,000 alumni gave $100,750 to their alma mater.

The need for gifts was cited by Dr. Hostetter who said that a full-time student at Goshen pays $1,590 in tuition fees this year. However, about $810 more per student is needed this year to meet operating costs.

In a joint session, OM and GC Youth Councils consider youth ministry in the local congregation.
Mennonite Central Committee Personnel Services reported to the MCC Executive Committee on Sept. 26 that a total of 641 applications have been received since Dec. 1, 1969. More than one third of these applications were submitted by persons not affiliated with Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches. It is felt that this high percentage of applications can be attributed largely to recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions opening the conscientious objector classification to a larger number of men.

From Presbyterian to Pentecostal, this group of applicants represents the widest possible variety in attitude toward Christ, the Christian faith, and the church. But one thing shared by all is the strong position against war and violence which forms the basis on which many are granted the CO classification. However, MCC finally selects for placement in MCC programs only those applicants who accept the MCC personnel qualifications, including church membership.

Persons not related to the Mennonite constituency come to MCC for a variety of reasons. Some have been referred by their local Selective Service Board, while others see descriptions of MCC in literature distributed by the local boards. As more men receive the I-O classification, the number of available positions which qualify for alternate service decreases. Similarly, as agencies fill their available positions, they refer applicants to other organizations that employ conscientious objectors. Through job shortage, many have come to MCC.

A significant number of applicants from other denominations are referred to MCC by those who are currently serving or have recently completed assignment. A volunteer in Atlanta, for example, encouraged his fraternity brother to join VS. Application was made and now fraternity brothers are serving together in Atlanta. Most persons desire involvement in a significant experience, an experience which provides opportunity to deal creatively with problems and to change the lives of persons and the conditions in which they live. In many situations, this is difficult to achieve; achievement comes slowly. But as small 'mountains' are moved, the word spreads.

The large number of applicants from both the Mennonite constituency and other denominations represents a vast resource of youthfulness, sacrifice, and potential. The church responds, tapping the resource and channeling the potential, which opens the door to demanding involvement. Enrichment is provided for both the volunteer and the church. — Lavon Welty, Secretary of Personnel Services.

GC Homecoming is Oct. 31 Weekend

Homecoming for alumni at Goshen College the weekend of Oct. 31 will feature Saturday activities for schoolteachers, scientists, nurses, musicians, artists, former college athletes, and former home economics students.

Alumni of the teacher education division will be guests at a special breakfast; brunch will be served to alumni of the home economics department. Nursing alumni will meet for a coffee hour Saturday morning; art alumni will also meet for coffee and then hear Prof. Marvin Bartel and Abner Hershberger speak on the latest advances in art instruction and methods.

A morning seminar to introduce the Center for Studies in Church Diplomacy will be led by Prof. J. R. Burkholder on the ideas: What are the major concerns and issues confronting the college and constituency today? How can the college be the servant of Christ in the seventies?

Music alumni and former choir members will meet at 10:00 a.m. to join current students and a strings section in performing Bach's "Jesu, meine Freude." Science alumni will meet for coffee at the Turner Precision X-Ray Measurements Laboratory. Events for "G" Council members, former varsity athletes, physical education majors, and intramural enthusiasts include a freshman intrasquad basketball game at 9:00 a.m., alumni vs. varsity basketball at 10:00, and lunch at 11:30 with current "G" Council members and physical education faculty, who have prepared a short after-luncheon program.

All luncheon events for the weekend include a show of recent works by art faculty in the Good Library gallery, a soccer contest between the Maple Leafs and Bluffton College at 2:00 Saturday afternoon, a buffet dinner for alumni and faculty members from 5:30 to 7:00 Saturday evening, and a concert by McHenry Boatwright, internationally famous black bass-baritone, at 8:00 p.m.

Sunday events include morning worship at 9:30 to be presented by a group of black students on the theme, "Obsession with Good News." Campus Church is set for 10:45. Sunday afternoon at 2:00 Prof. Philip K. Clemens will perform works by Franck, Walther, Bach, and Reger, and preludes by Pepping and Burkhardt in an organ recital.

The weekend has been planned by the Alumni Association in cooperation with college officials. More information is available from the Alumni Office.

Calvary Mennonite Church Picketed

The announcement of the opening of Christian day school facilities in the Calvary Mennonite Church in the Inglewood section of Los Angeles, Calif., has triggered confrontations with local militant individuals. LeRoy Bechler, Calvary pastor, reported that their church was picketed beginning Sunday morning, Sept. 13, and continuing through Thursday with the opening of Calvary Christian School.

"We've had several meetings with persons protesting the school, but thus far our school committee has been unable to achieve an understanding with them," Bechler said. "They claim that our school would be substandard in this black community — with inferior education, inexperienced teachers, and inadequate equipment. However, there appear to be other underlying motives for the opposition."

Less than one year ago the Calvary Mennonite Church moved into new facilities at 2400 West 85th Street in the Los Angeles Inglewood community. The building, formerly owned by the First Brethren Church, includes spacious facilities for worship and an elementary school. Subsequently, the congregation took action to establish Calvary Christian School.

Calvary Mennonite Church requests prayer support as they attempt to help the total community see the need for a Christian elementary education program as a vital part of the congregation's outreach.

Filmstrip Tackles Drug Problem

A 30-minute two-part filmstrip which takes an absorbing look at the growing problem of drug abuse has been added to the audiovisual library at Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. The Drug Threat: Your Community Response, produced by Guidance Associates of Pleasantville, N.Y., approaches the subject from the premise that "it can happen in your community." Its primary audience is adult leaders interested in developing a program of drug information, treatment, and education.

In Part One (Facing the Problem) young people from various regions of the United States describe the way many parents either refuse to admit the existence of a drug problem or are totally unaware of its existence in their community. Also discussed is the tendency for drug subcultures to form in those communities where communication has broken down between adults and youth or where the wrong kind of preventive action has been taken.

Part Two (Finding a Solution) addresses itself to the key organizing factors in a community drug abuse program: effective overall coordination of interagency activities, adequate funding, treatment facilities, and preventive drug education. The filmstrip asserts that effective action is possible, that many communities have already made progress in combating drug abuse, and that citizens involved need not be experts in order to make a worthwhile contribution.

FIELD NOTES

The dates for Ministers’ Week at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., this school year are Jan. 25 to Feb. 27, 1971. A special two-week course for ministers which has traditionally run the two weeks preceding Ministers’ Week will not run this year. The schedule is not firm up yet, but anyone desiring exact information about special speakers and program can write to George Brunk, Dean of the Seminary.

An exhibition featuring recent works by Goshen College’s art faculty is on display in the Good Library art gallery through Nov. 1.

The show features 18 works by Prof. Marvin Bartel, 18 pieces by Prof. Abner Hersberger, and five textile productions by Prof. Alta Hertzler. All entries were completed within the past year and reflect the thought and inspiration of each artist, as well as innovations popular in the art world.

T. Matiku Nyitambe is the new Administrator at Shirati Hospital, Tarime, Tanzania, replacing Nevin Kraybill. Mr. Nyitambe is a graduate of Goshen College and received his Master’s Degree in Hospital Administration at George Washington University. He returned to Tanzania last July.

Rosslyn Academy, Nairobi, Kenya, started its 1970-71 school year on Sept. 1 with 125 pupils. Abram and Joann Godshall are houseparents for the 32 who board at the school. Gary and Joanne Sensenig serve as principal and nurse respectively. Other teachers are Jere Brubaker, Miriam Buckwalter, Alice Hess, Clara Landis, and Janet Zimmerman. Part-time teachers are Anna Ruth Jacobs for Swahili and a local teacher for French and piano.

Willy Peterschmitt, Mennonite minister from Colmar, France, served in evangelistic meetings in Luxembourg from Sept. 21-27. Each day a service was held at Esch at 3:00 p.m. and at Dudelange at 8:00 p.m.

Omar Stahl, missionary in Luxembourg, served in meetings with the Mennonite Church at Backnang, Germany, Oct. 9-11. Reimar Schulz, who served at Dudelange during the summer furlough of the Stahls, returned to Germany on Sept. 26 to continue medical studies.

Howard H. Charles, Professor of New Testament at the Associated Mennonite Seminaries, Elkhart, Ind., was elected to membership in the Studiorum Novum Testamentum Societas at its twenty-fifth meeting held at Newcastle-on-Tyne in England in August. The society is composed of New Testament scholars from all over the world. Election to membership comes only upon nomination by two members and attainment of scholarship and teaching ability sufficient to qualify for the holding of a lecturing post in a university.

Harold Welsk was ordained by lot to the office of minister in the Bethel congregation at Blountsford, Fla., Sept. 13. Ransumair K. Harry, Trinidad, now a seminary student at EMC, Harrisonburg, Va., will be guest speaker at Salem Mennonite Church, Shelly, Pa., Oct. 23 (evening) and Oct. 25 (morning and evening).

Mennonite Central Committee is urgently looking for medical volunteers for Nigeria. The major part of relief and rehabilitation work presently being done in the war-torn areas of Nigeria is tied directly to medical staff. Since the end of the civil war in Nigeria in early 1970, MCC has been looking for two doctors and three nurses to fill positions with the Christian Council of Nigeria and with Quaker Service programs in the areas most affected by the war.

Persons interested should contact MCC Personnel Services, 21 South 12th Street, Akron, Pa. 17501.

Miguel Lopez will serve as pastor of the Tocoa congregation in Honduras. The Honduras Mennonite Church executive committee has named Lopez to replace Eastern Board missionary James Sauder who has just completed a four-year mission term and is now studying at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

The Mennonite Fellowship at Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., recently affiliated with a number of other denominations as a part of the United Ministry Board at Indiana University. This organization maintains a Center for campus ministries and allied services which includes a chapel, fellowship hall, classrooms, and secretarial services. This Center will become the headquarters for the Mennonite Fellowship at Indiana University; and in addition to providing Sunday worship services, it will serve as the location for special programs and activities related to Mennonite students.

One hundred and seventy-five Life Songs hymnbooks are needed. If a congregation has such for sale in good condition contact Eli Smucker, R. 1, Atglen, Pa. 19310.

The James Metzler family, EMBMC missionaries in Vietnam, arrived in the United States on Sept. 27 for a three-month furlough prior to their new assignment in the Philippines. Their address during furlough is 1531 Hillcrest Drive, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801.

Correction of addresses on “Overseas Missionary Directory” in Sept. 29 issue of Gospel Herald: Velma Espleman’s (on furlough from Tanzania) Box No. should be 1560. Daniel Dietz Ko’s correct address is: Apartado 3163, Managua, Nicaragua.

Calendar

Joint Meeting of Churchwide Boards and Mennonite General Convention, Yellow Creek Mennonite Church, Goshen, Ind., Oct. 20-22.
Allegheny Mission Rally, Spring Cove Junior High, Roaring Spring, Pa., Oct. 31—Nov. 1.
Eastern VS-in-service Leadership Training Conference, Kidron, Ohio, Nov. 2-6.
MCC Peace Section Assembly at Minneapolis, Minn., Nov. 19-21.
Virginia Conference Mission Board, Tuttle Avenue Mennonite Church, Sarasota, Fla., Nov. 26-29. at Williamson, Pa., Nov. 1-8.

New members by baptism: four at Bay Shore, Sarasota, Fla.; fourteen by baptism and two by confession of faith at Manson, Iowa.

J. David Yoder, a 1970 EMC graduate from Sugarcreek, Ohio, is the new director of admissions at Eastern Mennonite College. Kenneth G. Masterman, a native of Haverhill, Mass., will serve as associate director of admissions.

Robert Bishop, Doylestown, Pa., left Philadelphia on Oct. 7 for his overseas assignment in Caracas, Venezuela. After a stopover in Puerto Rico, he arrived in Caracas on Oct. 9. He will be teaching at the Presbytery High School in Caracas immediately upon arrival. Address: Collegio Americano, Apartado 61151, Caracas, Venezuela, S.A.

Dr. and Mrs. J. G. Yoder of Goshen left the U.S.A. for Nepal on Oct. 18. They flew via Honolulu, Tokyo, Hong Kong, and Calcutta. Dr. and Mrs. Yoder have been appointed to serve the United Mission to Nepal hospital at Gorkha (Amipal), a 20-minute flight west from Kathmandu. A commissioning service for the Yoders was held at Board Headquarters at 10:00 a.m. on Oct. 14. Their address: United Mission to Nepal, P.O. Box 126, Kathmandu, Nepal.

Dr. Harvey Bauman, retired India medical missionary of the General Conference Mennonite Church, died suddenly of a heart attack at his home in Coopersburg, Pa., on Oct. 6.

William Hallman, La Junta, Colo., reports: "We are finally able to report encouraging progress in Mrs. T. K. Her- shey's condition. The first week after surgery (pinning of a fractured hip) there was slow but steady progress. The second week there was no progress. Last Monday the doctors got the idea of moving her here with us. They brought a hospital bed and all necessary equipment. Many, many people have been praying for her and she has received stacks of cards and letters. Christian brotherhood is wonderful."

John Friesen, Shantipur, India, writes: "Daleep, 14-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. P. J. Malagar, Dhamtari, India, has been sick for more than a month with something that the doctors have not been able to diagnose. He has a high fever and he does not respond to antibiotics. This has been a terrific drain on Brother Malagar's strength, but he still has been trying to keep up with his various assignments. He needs our special prayer support."

Wilbur Hostetler, director of Home Bible Studies at Mennonite Board of Missions, lists 407 persons on the active role for HBS correspondence courses at the close of the third quarter (Sept. 30, 1970). This figure includes 132 new enrollees and 81 prisoners. Home Bible Studies presently offer five different courses of 12 lessons each as a public service by writing to Wilbur Hostetler at Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

The estate of Michel Richard, Seville, Ohio, recently bequeathed the sum of $5,000 to the Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, for use in either establishing or general support if older ones cannot be found. The late Mr. Richard was a member of the Mennonite Hill congregation in Milton Township, Wayne County, Ohio.

Let us use it more frequently.—Titus Martin, Bird in Hand, Pa.

The news release concerning the All-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism appearing in the Sept. 15 Herald is, to say the least, well done. It speaks clearly, encourages brotherly cooperation, and describes adequately the purposes of the Consultation which we all need to support. The news release in the Sept. 1 issue. Now I write because I feel words of commendation are as necessary as words of criticism.—Paul M. Lederach, Scottsdale, Pa.

The "An Open Letter to Pastors of College Students" of Aug. 25 was quite speculative and possibly will be more of a conundrum when the answer is in.

Apparently the old vexation of welcoming neither a "yes" nor "no" is still very alive. To seek one's own truth will find fulfillment only if it corresponds with the "truth" of which we are told: "The Word is truth."

Rose, Mim, Luke, and Dan, why not interpret the Word literally? If we take the interpretations of you four, which of yours will it be? Will you leave us "hanging out on a limb," with each a different one, telling us all "each do as you think is right in your own ideas"? This would confuse our already perplexed church people and make all more befuddled. Why not? You student tell the student what you tell the pastor: "We want to hear the Word! Preach it clear and strong. Proclaim it just like it is." This is the only way you preachers can be clear before God and those whom you try to teach. Don't try to hide behind your destructive theories. To do so will affect your whole eternity.

We want the Word literally taught and interpreted so that we can have confidence in you that you believe what you teach.

Remember, God gave the Word. He knew what He was going to convey to man. The writers, inspired of the Holy Spirit, were taken in different "historical settings" yet passed on the great message God gave to them.

One of our greatest wrongs among church people today is to refuse to obey God by letting His Word speak to our hearts in simple terms—just like it does.—D. D. Miller, Goshen, Ind.

I just finished reading the article by Wilmer D. Swope in the Sept. 15 Gospel Herald. It is right on point. I want to commend Merle G. Stoltzfus for his article in the June 23 issue and others on the same subject, namely the baptism in the Holy Spirit. I am gratified that so many seem to understand and feel the need for it.

At the same time I feel sorrow that adults in many places are opposing young people who have received the baptism in the Spirit, are joyfully witnessing with power, and are suffering attacks from others to Christ. People, (yes, Mennonites, too) are frantically searching for something to hold their young people, when all the time it is right there in the Bible, the very thing they are looking for. They are not Christians if they don't teach it. I have come to know many joyful people who witness with power because of the indwelling Holy Spirit—yes, and with the exercising of the gifts of the Spirit spoken of by the Apostle Paul under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

The Holy Spirit was "given" at Pentecost. Since then, we only read about people receiving Him and praise the Lord. He is being "poured out" all over the world just as He promised. But He still has to be received by us personally. Mennonites have made much of the eleventh chapter of Ephesians, but what we are missing. Well, then, if we should practice what is given here, it naturally follows that we should practice what comes after. Chapter 12 verse 31 says we are to covet earnestly the best gifts and the next chapter eludes to that the best way to do in love. It is the right time we get rid of our apathy in this matter, I.
I appreciate the space you gave to the problem of environmental pollution in the Sept. 29 issue of Gospel Herald. A statement in the article "Man: Earth’s Deadliest Peril," by Robert J. Hastings prompted me to write. "Yes, one of the Great Lakes—Lake Erie—is already dead. Only sludge worms and a mutant of the carp can exist in its murky waters. This once beautiful lake—now only a septic tank—produced 75 million pounds of fish in 1955. No one in his right mind would eat a Lake Erie fish today, if one could be found.

We live in a village on the northern shores of Lake Erie. Miles of summer cottages stretch out on its beaches. We swim in the lake with the approval of the Health Department. Several times this summer when the lake was calm you could see the lake bottom clearly. A neighboring community has a fish farm industry—perch, and this year, salmon were caught. The catch is smaller than 10 years ago, but the perch are sold locally and are also exported to markets in U.S. and Canada. (Weber, Aug. 13, 1970.)

In regard to Mr. Lind’s article in the Aug. 11 issue of Gospel Herald, I would like to agree with Mr. Lind that Christ was a fair political revolutionary. Not by the wildest stretch of the imagination could anyone think that, and we should not waste any more time trying to prove it.

I would like to maintain that Christ was a revolutionary, however, in that He did “cause a complete or marked change in something.” (This is according to Webster, also.)

When He and His disciples atoned on the Sabbath, when He drove the money changers out of the Temple, when He healed on the Sabbath—you know. He wouldn’t have had to heal those people on the Sabbath, there were six other days He could have healed them. This really was revolutionary. Do you suppose He did it deliberately? As we follow Him to His death, time and again we see Him performing these revolutionary acts.

Not the least of these, and this impresses me deeply, are His castigations. His severe reprimands, and biting sarcasm directed to the church people. Would we, in the same hand, not once did He condemn a sinner. His love and compassion flowed out to them and they responded.

He is our example. Do we follow Him all the way, or only as long as we don’t have to “stick out our necks”? We’ll gladly be a Christian as long as He doesn’t ask us to do anything that might cause some eyebrow raising or questions. Is our standard set by “Our Father?” “What will people think?” or what Christ asks us to do? I am thankful for our young people. There are many in our church who might be Christian revolutionists, and I thank God for them. At any rate, they are giving us ‘older’ reasons to search our hearts, and their friends have led us to a new evaluation of ourselves and our relationship to the living Christ. After living with teenage delinquents the last few years we have had no choice but to take a new look at the living Christ. himself, is the only source of strength and courage to promote the kind of revolution He started. Let’s not let it die down.

Uruguay: The Spirit of the Lord Upon Us

By B. Frank Byler

"The Spirit of the Lord upon Us" is doctrinally affirmed by Mennonite Mission personnel in Uruguay. However, it would be hard for us to say with great confidence that what is happening here is what was spoken by the prophet Joel, as Peter did on the day of Pentecost. Neither the contagious witness nor the power for saving evidenced on that day seem to be very impressive here. We do believe, however, that the Spirit is upon us and that He is doing His work in and through us.

Harnessing the Members

Ideally, a congregation should contain a number of families. While there are a few such families, in too many cases there is only one evangelically oriented member present in a given family. This often means that they are somewhat isolated and limited in influencing the rest of their relatives. They should be the bridge for winning their relatives, but too often they find themselves unable to witness effectively.

Because of a breakdown in family life, some persons find their brothers in the local church. We hope these individuals might form "families" that will become members of the church in the future. This lack of entire families in our churches is an ongoing concern.

The Spirit keeps us continually conscious of the need to encourage the participation of each member. In Sauce, Pastor Lahuz has a goal of using the membership for extension visitation and literature distribution. He anticipates using them in round table types of public meetings, dealing with concerns that interest unbelievers, and interpreting to them the benefits of Christ for the improvement of personal and community conditions. Rather than continuing with tent campaigns, he feels every member must become involved in praying with two other people. He envisions a meeting once a month where the members manifest their loyalty to Christ while making a special effort to bring unbelievers to church.

Pastoral Support

Up until now the church has favored the fully supported, full-time pastorate. However, Pastor Dreidger, who graduated this year from Montevideo Seminary and is serving the La Paz congregation, now contemplates finding work to partially support himself. This is in line with the practice of the German church from which he comes and supports the convictions of many of us for establishing strong self-supporting congregations. It is also related to the concern for involving the members in the ministry. If their pastor does secular work and serves the church at the same time, it could be a good example for the rest of the brethren.

Examining Worship

We feel that the Spirit is leading us into new forms of worship which more actively involve the membership. Already last year Dan Miller was moving away from the traditional preaching service. This was continued during this year to emphasize spontaneity, letting the Spirit speak through the group to their immediate concerns. Alternatives may be prearranged for occasions when something does not spontaneously appear. Miller uses this system almost exclusively in the Timbues congregation.

Here is an example of a service procedure. It was the farewell meeting for Tito Isnardi who was going to Buenos Aires to study. The congregation asked him why he was going there to study and what he expected to see upon his return. His answer developed spontaneously into an exhortation to the young people who were not yet baptized to ask for baptism and become committed members of the church.
church. His extended answer became the message for the church that day.

The Floresta congregation practices what they call preaching-in-dialogue. After one person offers a prepared meditation, the meeting is immediately opened for the members to testify concerning what the Lord has said to them as the preacher spoke. In this way the message is not focused on one preacher, but becomes a message of the brotherhood as they think together and testify to each other. The problem arises as to how to keep certain strong-minded personalities from turning the service into a debate instead of an experience that leads to personal dedication and faithful action as followers of the Lord.

In seminary chapel we also began seeking new forms. Much frustration ensued as we sought new ways to fill the needs of students for edification and participation in worship. In young lives at times it is hard to know if it is the "spirit of revolution" or the Holy Spirit that is upon us. We believe the Holy Spirit speaks to us through these young lives that are rightly concerned about the weaknesses of traditional ways.

Threats to Unity

It is sometimes hard to distinguish between the desire to live comfortably at peace, evading the uncomfortable problems that accompany involvement, and the willingness to be pricked in our consciences so that inactivity can give way to involvement. This shows up especially in relation to proposed Latin-American solutions for liberation, and the traditional North American concept of ministering to the world by making disciples who will then be the salt of the earth and the light of the world.

The Spirit is awakening us to these concerns for liberty and justice in Latin America. In the process communications become difficult because with the same words, different positions say different things. Youthful idealism is optimistic about the possibility of man fixing up his world so God can work. It is difficult for many to accept this optimism. The almost exasperating insistence on charging imperialism, rather than personal sin, as the greatest problem of Latin America, threatens unity at times. The Spirit does lead us in this way to reexamine our position, to redefine our mission, and to discern what is vital as against what is peripheral and transitory.

There is an underlying unity in that we are all together seeking and trying to understand each other. This situation is found in both church and seminary. The Spirit leads us to seek to maintain unity, although the tension that exists does at times test our faith to stick together. There is unity in the sense that we all see the need for the church to serve the community where its members live. The almost contradictory ideas as to what specifically is this service or how it is to be carried out make decisions difficult.

Church Architecture

We are in the stage of building churches. The Spirit has led us to question the old type meetinghouse or "holy place" and to weigh the possibility of a functional building that can serve various aspects of community needs. The first building went up in Sauce. New architectural concepts led them to build a functional clinic and community center first. However, a traditional church house was also begun back of this building. It remains to be seen what kind of church architecture will eventually develop.

The Timbues congregation is still planning a building. Undoubtedly it will not be an old-style "holy place," since service and worship are to be combined in one building.

The Future

We feel that the Spirit is leading us toward the formation of a Spanish-speaking conference here in Uruguay. There is already a German-speaking conference, but this will probably function independently for some years to come. Our Spanish churches are conscious of the need for finding more unity in discerning what is specifically Anabaptist and the reason for a Mennonite existence. A need also exists for working together and thinking together on outward practices in addition to defining our mission in general.

Nine seminary students graduated this year and were immediately given responsible places in the churches. Many more leaders are needed for local congregations. The Spirit is leading us to make a self-study of the seminary ministry to discover how to become a better servant of the churches by carrying out a program of leadership training for the local congregation. A "decentralized seminary," which extends seminary teaching to the congregations, is becoming more of a live option for the future.

Briefly Stated

Pray for the minister. Yes, we do. But just as much we hearers need prayers. I believe the minister has spent more time and effort praying for a message from God than the members have. We want to pray earnestly that God will open our hearts to His message and that it will bring forth fruit in our lives. — Anna May Garber.
"If Elected I Will...."

Fall is the time of year when new leaders and officers are given responsibility in your congregation. I have never heard of a person who campaigned actively and publicly for the Sunday school superintendent's job. Nor have I heard of anyone in our congregations who was running for office as the liberal (or conservative) candidate for chairman of the church council. Probably it is good that I haven't heard of such shenanigans. Yet, there are plenty of ways to campaign for a church job without really appearing to. These we have all heard about.

Aside from the bad connotations of politicking there would be something good about running for the major congregational offices. As it is, persons are often pushed into jobs all the while protesting that they aren't equipped, haven't the qualifications, and that so and so could do a lot better. As soon as elected they go right ahead and prove it. These persons find themselves in office with no promises to keep except that they will do a poor job.

On the other hand a little campaigning would demand a measure of responsibility. A candidate could say, "Now here is my vision for this congregation. If elected I would by God's Spirit do my very best to help this congregation move toward these goals." Further, the candidate could tell the congregation why he thinks God is leading him to take this responsibility. What is the evidence in his own life of God's active presence? It would call for a testimony.

I think it would be fair to say that once elected most of the persons in major offices in our congregations do feel a measure of responsibility. The trouble is they are not sure what the priorities are for this year and next so they hardly know how to lead effectively. If they make their own judgments of where the congregation should be going they can be accused of being individualistic or they may find themselves in conflict with another leader who has different goals. A pastor and a Sunday school superintendent should work together, not against each other.

There is a way that happily is being used more frequently by congregations. It is the leadership retreat. Many models are valid, but generally it is this. All the leaders, pastors, officers, teachers spend a long weekend together. They eat there, sleep there, pray, seek God's leading for their congregation, and end the weekend with concrete decisions about priorities for the coming year. This creates a teamness and sets a direction which is invaluable if a congregation intends to be serious about mobilizing itself for mission.

Try it this fall.

"They looked unto him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed" (Ps. 34:5).

Archer Wallace tells of a mother who sat knitting in the gathering twilight with her little girl beside her. The child noticed that her mother repeatedly looked away to where the distant stars were appearing. She asked, "Mother, why do you look at the stars?" The mother replied, "To rest my eyes, dear."

It is true that too close application to something near at hand may impair the eyesight and injure vision. We are not to look only on the things of time, material things. Keeping these only before us impairs our spiritual eyesight. We are not to look only at our problems and difficulties. These will injure our eyesight. We must look higher.

So the psalmist speaks of those who looked higher, to the Lord and they were lightened.

In another sense also we find rest when we get a larger vision. Says David Smith, eighteenth-century expositor, "The more we can think upon our Lord, and the less upon ourselves, the better. Looking to Him, as He is seated upon the right hand of the throne of God, will keep our heads, and especially our hearts, steady when going through the deep waters of affliction. Often have I thought of this when crossing the water opposite the old place of Langholm. I found, when I looked down into the water, I got dizzy; I therefore fixed my eyes upon a steady object on the other side, and go comfortably through."

As Paul Scherer long since noted, many modern theologians have reversed the words of Paul, "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." They read it as if it said, "Where grace abounded, sin did much more abound."

In fact, one often detects a sort of reverse hypocrisy in present-day religious discussion. Some actually seem to feel that in order to be humble they must make much of their sinfulness. But while sin humiliates, it does not make men humble. Sin, as the Bible defines it, is the outward expression of an intolerable pride that exalts the human will above the will of God. — W. T. Purkiser, editor of Herald of Holiness.

Past Due

They came with a justified complaint. They grew up in the church, married, and came to middle age. Now they felt the church had failed them at a very important point. Why? Because of its poor job in teaching stewardship. "Never," they said, "did our pastor preach a sermon on tithing."

Only a few years ago this Mennonite farming couple were challenged to sacrificial faith giving by a person outside the denomination. Now they bore a radiant testimony to what this had meant to them as a family. And they complained to me that the church does so little in specific teaching members to give.

As they talked I also had the strong feeling that this couple had not only learned the joy of giving but that their giving followed the one who had challenged them in the first place. Their giving went outside the church to a lone program and person who did not bat an eye when he challenged them to give.

I agree with this couple. The church did fail them. The church steers clear of its charge to preach stewardship and by so doing robs its members of the blessing of giving. I’ve known a few pastors who taught members to give biblically through preaching and teaching what God says about stewardship. They did it, not in a series of sermons, all at one time until it became nauseating to many, but in three or four sound biblical messages per year. They did it also by personal example.

People must learn to give. And if we teach people to take the Scripture seriously and preach the Scripture sincerely we will soon see the claims of God on all of life. And these claims include our money. Because just about everything we do relates to money, God is concerned that we take it seriously.

Now, I believed ever since I began to understand what the Bible says about our stewardship that the giving of the tithe is the minimum, or better, the beginning giving for the Christian steward.

And when I say that I’m no longer afraid of people calling the tithe legalism. Until a person tithes he still is living below the law. The law shows us when we are sinners.

Pity the preacher who does not preach the giving of tithes and offerings. Pity the people also. Such a preacher is not only letting the people rob God but he robs his people of the blessings God has. As Israel disregarded the tithe tragedy overtook them. At each spiritual awakening the payment of the tithe was one of the first reforms.

Robbery is a serious crime, especially against God. Yet many, in the words of Malachi, are guilty. He says that those who do not give tithes and offerings are robbers, no less. Jesus in referring to the Old Testament, commands the tithe saying, “These you ought to have done.” Jesus assumed the tithe and no one can take His words or the rest of the New Testament seriously and give less than the tithe.

Some ask, “But what is the tithe?” Look at your income tax statement. It is one tenth of this.

But the tithe, so computed, should be the minimum standard of giving. The tithe is the poor man’s giving. As one earns more, his percentage of giving should increase. The Christian dare never be satisfied with the tithe.

In Jesus’ time Jews likely paid two tithes, and perhaps three tithes every third year. The first temple was built with freewill offerings above the tithe. It would seem God intends that our buildings, the support of our ministry, and the church’s programs should be supported by our tithes. Offerings should support relief and outreach.

Milo Kauffman in his excellent book, The Challenge of Christian Stewardship, says,

“What does it mean if we as Christians decide on a lower standard of giving than the tithe? If we believe that we are loyal followers of Christ and are giving less than the tithe the following must be true:

“1. Jesus, our Lord, set a lower standard of giving than did Moses.

“2. The gospel or Jesus Christ sounds a retreat.

“3. The Christian under grace owes less to God than did the Jew under the law.

“4. The stern demands of the law produce better results than the gospel of grace—Sinai is stronger than Calvary.

“5. That either Christ’s cause is not as worthy as was Judaism or that it needs less to carry it on.

“6. That Christians receive less from God than did the Jews and, therefore, should not give as large a portion.

“7. Christians are not as able to give as were the Jews.”

Every argument for the tithe which could be brought to bear upon the Jew applies with increased emphasis upon the Christian today.

No, we do not believe that the state should collect the tithe for the church as in the days of Charlemagne. We believe the Christian should freely give out of a heart of love and gratitude. He should give the tithe and more. Let us preach it until we do it and see if Jesus’ promise is true that “it is more blessed to give than to receive.”

Why not use this editorial as a starter of honest discussion in your family, church, or Sunday school class. We are past due to receive the blessings of heaven which fall when we are faithful in our giving. May none feel that we have failed them in teaching stewardship. — D.
"Active" Nonresistance

By Conrad G. Brunk

I call you to a reevaluation of the teaching of nonresistance or Christian pacifism for our age. This is implied in a renewed understanding of nonconformity, because if we regain a sensitivity to the needs of our age, it is going to profoundly influence our peace witness in the world. I believe that it is time for us to affirm with new vigor and new understanding this belief that is so central to the Christian gospel — to take it out of the isolated confines of our quiet rural communities and test it squarely in the middle of the violence that is tearing at our world today.

Mennonites have always rightly maintained that essential to the Christian message is the message of peace and brotherhood — and that a renunciation of this as a practical reality in the life of the Christian is an open renunciation of the power of the gospel in human society. Never before has this message been needed in the world as it is today. I need not recount for you the innumerable examples of violence and destruction that are present in our world and in our country today. We are overwhelmed with accounts of violent confrontation in the news media every day, perhaps even to the point where it no longer moves us.

A Strange Approach

I have been appalled and saddened by the position which many of the people who give lip-service to the doctrine of nonresistance have taken in the face of the war and violence that has engulfed our country today. I have heard the argument among us that perhaps God is working out His will in the world through the military involvements of the United States in the war zones of the world.

Often it is seriously suggested that violence is the only proper way to meet the violence of the communists in Indo-china and elsewhere in the world. I wonder when we accepted the notion that God accomplishes His purposes in the world through hate and violent death rather than through the reconciling power of love. When did we endorse the thesis that a war may be just if God is on our side, even if we cannot participate in that war?

When did we abandon our belief that the power of love is greater than that of violence, to embrace the hope that peace on earth can be won by armed violence? Are the people of the so-called "peace churches" waving the flag of nationalism as wildly as those who make no distinction between God and country? If we have reached such a point as a church, then what meaning does our so-called "nonresistance" have for our world? What hope does it hold for men?

The time is upon us to take the Christian teaching of peace and love into the world where it is so sorely needed, and out of the cloisters of the Mennonite community, where it is fast becoming a mere institution — a form of godliness that has no power. It is time for us to recall that Jesus did not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

It is time for all Mennonites, and all who believe in the way of love, to decide whether or not they really believe in the power of redemptive love in the world. And let those who really believe it say so; and say it with power to a world that knows nothing of peace.

What is the difference in the last analysis between the many in our campuses and streets who have turned to violence in their frustrated call for peace, and those so-called "peace-loving Christians" who condone the use of bombs and bullets and napalm in Vietnam and Cambodia as a valid way to achieve the peace — even though they themselves refuse to be involved? When are we going to reach the end of our rationalizing as a church, and recognize violence as violence and call it for what it is?

In the aftermath of the killing of the four students at Kent State I have been amazed at the "nonresistant Christians" who have remarked that these violent people deserved the violent death they suffered.

Again I ask you to consider: When did we accept the belief that violence is the valid response to violence, or that death is proper recompense for misconduct? Have we accepted finally the principle of political power that seems to guide our nation which states that all opposition must be eliminated before it gains a strong voice?

Witness Against Violence

It is time for Christians who seek for reconciliation in the world to witness against violence wherever it occurs, whether it is perpetuated by the dissenter or by the patriot, by the enemy or by one's own government. The church must witness to the reconciling power of love even in those times and places where it is extremely unpopular and even considered "unpatriotic" to do so. For our tradition has always correctly held that the authority of God always stands above

Conrad G. Brunk served the past two years as instructor in philosophy at EMC. He will serve the next two years as assistant director of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors in Washington, D.C. This is Part 3 of his baccalaureate address at Eastern Mennonite College, May 24, 1970 the authority of any secular power.

There is a vacuum in our world today which could be filled by a strong nonresistant voice coming from the church. This vacuum has developed because the many people in our country who are distressed by the violence of their government have themselves turned to violent means in order to achieve their hope of peace.

As the dissenters to war have themselves turned to violent tactics, they have negated their message of peace. It is for us, who reject violence in principle as a legitimate means, to fill this vacuum with a powerful witness. Is our faith that violence is never a viable means of achieving peace still tenable in our time? If it is, then let those of us who believe it affirm it openly and without excuse. Now is the time for us to become "peace-makers" in the world, and not "peacemakers" only.

When did we endorse the thesis that a war may be just if God is on our side, even if we cannot participate in that war?

I affirm again the belief that if we regain our sense of nonconformity, and our sense of the "worldliness" of the world, we will also regain our ability to speak to the world with a clear voice. A true nonconformity is the key to a new understanding of the relation of church and state for our time.

There is always the question raised: "What right has the church to tell the state what to do?" We need a reevaluation of our idea of the separation of the church and the state for our day. This idea can no longer serve as a rationalization for our inaction and speechlessness when relating to the state. In a democratic society this rationalization loses its power, especially when government leaders openly invoke God and Christian principles as the sanction for their actions.

If the church refuses to speak out in this situation then the image of Christ is stained in the eyes of the world and the Christian gospel of God's reconciling love becomes a travesty. Yes, a true nonconformity to the world necessitates a separation of the church from the state; but this separation is precisely what frees the church to witness to the state! The tragedy of the Christian church in America is that it is not separate enough from the state and precisely because of this it cannot be a prophetic witness — it is not able to clearly discern "the good, the acceptable, and the perfect."

We need to understand anew, for our time, the obligations which this principle puts upon us in the face of a society that claims to trust in God and to seek His will, and yet spends hundreds of billions of tax dollars to amass the greatest destructive power in the world and puts it to brutal use all over the world. We affluent Mennonites are contributing our share to these billions.

Is it not time for us to take concrete, consistent measures that get at the root of the system that makes these billions available for military purposes? James K. Stauffer, a veteran missionary in Vietnam, writes in a recent news release: "The time has come for the peace churches to request a plan whereby our tax dollars could be channeled directly to some constructive cause. Campus protests, street demonstrations, draft card burnings, etc., have not been effective in stopping the war. But choking off the funds that feed the military-industrial complex could bring results."

Stauffer goes on to suggest that the principle of "rendering unto Caesar" must be reinterpreted in our situation — we must recapture the Spirit of the principle and not the letter of it (which killeth!).

A New Approach

I challenge you to seek new and meaningful ways to actively engage the teaching of nonresistance in your world. These ways must be means of witness which speak forcefully, but which are not violent and do not negate the basic premise of nonresistance.

Perhaps most importantly, a new concept of peacemaking for our time will seek to understand the sources and causes of violence in our society — the racial hatred, the poverty, the blind nationalism — and will become engaged redemptively in these situations. A pacifism for our time cannot afford to be naive about violence and power. It must strike at its very roots. I challenge you to help realize this concept.

These are merely a few suggestions of the direction that I believe the Christian church must take if it is to experience the vigor and spirit which makes a movement powerful and effective. There is much work to be done, and in many other areas. We need a reevaluation of our concept of what it means to be a brotherhood in an urban society; of the idea of the "simple life" in an affluent, technological age; and of the doctrine of the disciplined church in a pluralistic society. You are the people who will make these discoveries, and more importantly, you are the ones who must help implement them.

I am not asking you to merely become "relevant" to your world. "Relevance" can be a very dangerous goal, because it can so easily become a conformity with the world. Perhaps this is what is happening to the church today — it is becoming so "relevant" that it has forfeited the content of its message. But neither am I asking you to become "irrelevant." Rather, I am calling you to a radical nonconformity which will call you out from among the world as a clear witness to that world.

Gospel Herald, October 27, 1970
I call you to a return to your heritage which will not be a retreat to old forms, but a renewed understanding and realization of them. I call you all to be prophets in the land, to be witnesses in the uttermost parts of the earth.

Through your reevaluation of the Christian values for your age the church will retain its life and witness and will avoid making God’s law null and void out of respect for your tradition.

I close with these further words of Jesus in Matthew 9:16, 17.

“No one sews a patch of unshrunk cloth on to an old coat; for then the patch tears away from the coat, and leaves a bigger hole. Neither do you put new wine into old wineskins; if you do, the skins burst, and then the wine runs out and the skins are spoilt. No, you put new wine into fresh skins; then both are preserved.”

Dialogue on Mennonite General Conference

The following is a dialogue used by James Lapp, pastor at Perkasie, Pa. It is given as an example of a creative approach to help people see the importance and place of one of our church agencies.

Pastor: “And God has appointed in the church first apostles, second prophets, third teachers, then workers of miracles, then healers, helpers, administrators . . . .”

First Reader: Administrators? Administrators . . . well, I think the church is too organized already and that we have too many chiefs and not enough Indians to do the work.

Second Reader: I agree. We send all this money to Elkhart and Akron for all these organization men to carry on their big programs — money that might better be spent right here at home in our community.

Pastor: What money? Do we send any money to support the denominational projects of our Mennonite Church?

Third Reader: Certainly. Why we send thousands of dollars to the Mission Board at Elkhart every year.

Pastor: Of course, but do we ever send any contributions to the Mennonite General Conference which has offices at Scottdale?

Fourth Reader: Why should we? What does General Conference ever do for us except to ask for our money to pay big salaries to some executives to do a lot of busywork?

Fifth Reader: Now wait a minute! I want to get in this discussion, too. If it wasn’t for the Worship Committee of General Conference, we wouldn’t have these new hymnals we now enjoy.

Sixth Reader: And if it wasn’t for the Peace and Social Concerns Committee, who would give our denomination prophetic leadership on questions of peace, war, race, and poverty?

Pastor: Not to mention the recruitment of ministers, education and guidance in Christian Stewardship, planning and coordinating Convention 70 for young people in North Carolina this summer, maintaining archives for our denomination, preparing materials for the instruction of new converts, or preparing leadership training courses, or Sunday Evening Program Guides. . . .

First Reader: OK, OK . . . so they do more than run around looking busy. But why all this fuss about Mennonite General Conference this morning?

Pastor: Because they provide a lot of services to us and we haven’t sent them very much money lately. And right now the leaders of General Conference are $20,000 in debt with more bills yet to come in.

Second Reader: Well that is too bad, but we are a small congregation you know. Besides, we just finished a major remodeling project ourselves. Maybe some other churches are better situated right now than we are to help them out.

Pastor: Possibly they are. It is true we are a small congregation. But let’s remember General Conference’s total budget for a year is only $140,000, which isn’t very much considering we have a 100,000 membership in North America in our denomination.

Third Reader: You have a point there. It doesn’t sound as though anyone is getting rich on that kind of money.

Pastor: How about looking at it this way. A contribution to Mennonite General Conference is a vote of confidence in our Mennonite denomination. If we wish to be a part of this particular body of Christians, we will need to assume in at least a small way the financial responsibility for her program.

Fourth Reader: OK, you have convinced me. What can we do?

Pastor: I suggest we start by giving this congregation an opportunity for an above budget contribution to the Mennonite General Conference. If each member would give $1.00 (10 cups of coffee or 7 cokes) we could offer some financial assistance and give a token of appreciation to our denomination for the services she renders to us. In this way we could make possible a strong and united denominational witness for Christ both at home and across our nation. Certainly we can’t begin to pay off this huge debt, but it is “each part . . . working properly, (that) makes bodily growth” possible for us all.
Mennonite Mutual Aid is a not-for-profit ministry of the Mennonite Church. Your assessment $ does not build skyscrapers, buy yachts, or pile up profits. Neither do they compete for your missions giving dollar.

EACH MONTH YOUR ASSESSMENT $ HELPS TO:

- deliver 55 babies;
- remove 18 gall bladders, 32 tonsils and adenoids;
- repair 18 hernias, 56 broken bones;
- treat 116 heart conditions, 39 eyes and ears, 44 cancers, 37 nervous and mental, 276 accidents, and 405 miscellaneous medical treatments and surgeries.

YOUR ASSESSMENT $ ALSO HELPS PROVIDE:

- $2,000 per month for hardship cases through Catastrophe Aid (assistance beyond the Membership Agreement);
- $7,200 per month for Fraternal projects (church projects without funds from other sources. Fraternal Funds is money saved in lieu of taxes);
- 98 congregational groups;
- 1001 demonstrations of spontaneous mutual aid stimulated by MMA participation (How can one tabulate these many expressions of sensitive brotherhood?).
The Woman’s Christian Temperance Union has been challenged to become “the good guys with the white hats with a positive approach to alcohol.”

Addressing the group’s ninety-sixth annual convention in Los Angeles on the topic, “The Positive Approach to Abstinence,” was Dr. Lindsay R. Curtis, nationally known physician and author.

“Perhaps we should admit that our abstinence program has been less than a spectacular success,” he said, “It may mean that we need to change our image.”

Dr. Curtis observed that because of their tendency to be negative, abstinence proponents have been dubbed “squares,” “spoilsports,” “narrow-minded,” and “living in the past.”

“We should move to the positive side,” he declared. “We should be for abstinence because we are for the dignity of man. We are for abstinence because it protects the freedom of man.”

Dr. Curtis pointed out that judges feel alcohol is responsible for more than 50 percent of divorces, and that an alcoholic is estimated to lose an average of $1,000 and 22 days of work per year.

“We are for happier homes, we are for prosperity,” he said. “We are for safety in driving, we are for longer life because abstinence gives a man 21 years of life lost to a chronic alcoholic.”

The Lutheran Hour marked its thirty-eighth season on the air with an opening rally Sept. 30.

Dr. Oswald Hoffmann, speaker on The Lutheran Hour in the U.S. and Canada, addressed the rally on the theme, “Our Blessed Hope... Salvation to All Men,” based on a text from Titus 9:11-14.

A massed chorus of several hundred voices and a pageant called the Parade of Nations was featured. The pageant included families wearing the colorful dress of many of the 125 nations to which The Lutheran Hour broadcasts its programs.

The Lutheran Hour, sponsored by the Lutheran Laymen’s League of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, will begin its thirty-eighth season with more than 900 stations in the U.S. and Canada carrying the English-speaking programs each week. Another 650 stations will broadcast them in more than 40 different languages.

Most missionaries in Africa are modern, forward-looking, tolerant, and selﬁsh people, concerned to help Africans and enter into their lives, according to a specially commissioned report written by two young agnostics.

And the couple, husband-and-wife team Richard and Helen Exley, described some of the missionaries they met as “like jewels in a sea of sand.”

The report, “In Search of the Missionary,” is a 40-page document summing up a four-week investigation into modern missionary life in East Africa. The study was sponsored by the Church Missionary Society, one of the world’s biggest Anglican missionary bodies, which pledged in advance that it would sponsor publication of the report, “warts and all.”

The Seventh-day Adventist Church, an American-born church founded in 1865, reached the 2 million mark in world membership recently. More than 25,000 Adventists concluded their 10-day quadrennial conference in Atlantic City with delegates from 193 countries. Robert H. Pierson, president of the church since 1966 was reelected to another four-year term by unanimous vote.

Attacks by the Women’s Liberation Movement on the institutions of marriage and the family must be resisted, a Southern Baptist Convention aide said.

Harry N. Hollis, director of special moral concerns for the denomination’s Christian Life Commission, said the feminist movement wants to ignore the differences between male and female.

“Such sheer negativism against God’s good gift of sex must be condemned,” he told participants in a conference on Christianity and Sexuality in Contemporary Society at the Southern Baptist conference center.

While urging support of those who “genuinely seek to eliminate obvious discrimination against females,” Mr. Hollis opposed ending all laws against abortion, elimination of instruction about sex roles in sex education programs, abolition of marriage and child bearing as a means of escaping sexual enslavement, and support of female communes with no physical relationships with males.

A Southern Baptist Home Mission Board executive has charged that many churches in the denomination are controlled by “racists.”

Kenneth L. Chafin of Atlanta, evangelism director of the board, told some 2,500 Southern Baptists attending Home Missions Week meetings that they need to be more realistic about how deeply racism was ingrained within members of the church.

He defined racism as “one man judging the worth of another man by his race.”

Mr. Chafin referred to a recent action taken by First Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala. After eight hours of debate and 10 ballots, the church narrowly voted down a motion to dismiss the entire staff— which had engaged in an interracial ministry and advocated the acceptance of two Negro converts as members.

“When a great church in a great city is confronted by a little woman and her 10-year-old daughter who have been converted as a result of that church’s ministry,” the evangelism director stated, “and they sit up until 3 in the morning and by four votes finally agree not to fire the staff—we are not as far along as I had thought.”

The American Issue reports that previous to Prohibition 1910-1914, alcohol consumption was 22.43 gallons per capita. During Prohibition it dropped to 7.1 gallons per capita. In 1968 it was 19.96 gallons per capita.

More than 13 million Americans are reported to have kicked the smoking habit since 1966, bringing to 29 million the number who are now members of the nation’s “unhooked generation.”

Nearly two thirds of the adult population are now nonsmokers, according to a survey cited at the first National Conference on Smoking and Health. Less than a decade ago, nearly half the adult population smoked.

And for the first time since the “emancipated American female” began smoking in public a half century ago, cigarette smoking among adult women has reportedly declined.

Dr. Daniel Horn, director of the National Clearing House for Smoking and Health which conducted the survey, said there are now 300,000 fewer female smokers than there were in 1966, despite a population increase of about 3 million adult women.

U.S. Surgeon General Jesse L. Steinfeld told the conference that cigarette smoking was a “chronic form of suicide,” and promised continued government support to help halt it.

“I believe the time is ripe for government and voluntary groups to mount a much more vigorous fight on all fronts to portray cigarette smoking for what it is—a dirty, smelly, foul, chronic form of suicide with the added uncertainty of Russian roulette for the individual smoker,” he declared.
Twenty-Seven Attend Orientation

Twenty-seven persons attended the second orientation in August at Mennonite Central Committee, Aug. 17 to 19. The remainder of the orientation was held in St. John's, Newfoundland, for those going there for teaching assignments. Twenty-three of the orientees accepted assignments in Newfoundland, while three went to Toronto assignments and one to Atlanta.

Mennonite Church volunteers:

Dorothy Brubacher, Monetville, Ont., has accepted a two-year teaching assignment in Newfoundland. She will be teaching in an isolated community in an elementary school. Dorothy is a graduate of North Bay Teachers' College and is a member of the Monetville Mennonite Church, Monetville.

Kenneth and Carol Drudge, Tavistock, Ont., have accepted a two-year teaching assignment in Red Bay, Labrador. Kenneth attended Goshen College and received a BA in education from Waterloo Lutheran University. His wife received an elementary teacher's certificate from Stratford Teachers' College. Both are members of the East Zorra Mennonite Church, Tavistock.

Margaret Hunsberger, West Montrose, Ont., will be teaching for the next year in Newfoundland. She is a graduate of Goshen College with a BA in English and had taught school previously to volunteering for this assignment. She is a member of the Bloomingdale Mennonite Church, Bloomingdale, Ont.

Margaret Jutzi, Millbank, Ont., has accepted a one-year teaching assignment in Salt Pond, Newfoundland. She will be teaching in an elementary school. Margaret is a graduate of Rockway Mennonite School and attended Stratford Teachers' College and Waterloo Lutheran University. She is a member of the Poole Mennonite Church, Poole, Ont.

Clair and Charlene Leaman, Sadsburyville, Pa., have volunteered for a two-year teaching assignment in Brownsdale, Newfoundland. Both of them will be teaching music. Clair attended West Chester State College and was graduated with a BA in music from Westminster Choir College. Charlene attended Mars Hill College and received a BA in music education from Westminster Choir College. Clair is a member of the Newville Mennonite Church, Coatesville, Pa., and his wife is a member of the Woodbrook Baptist Church, Baltimore, Md.

Ralph and Joanne Lehman, Kidron, Ohio, have volunteered for a two-year teaching assignment in Newfoundland. Ralph will be teaching at the Salt Pond School and his wife will be teaching at Creston School on Burin Peninsula. He attended Eastern Mennonite College and was graduated from Malone College with a BA in history. His wife attended Hesston College. Both are members of the Kidron Mennonite Church, Kidron, Ohio.

Delbert and Patricia Penner, Weatherford, Okla., have volunteered for a two-year term of service in Newfoundland. Delbert is a graduate of Southwestern State College where he received his AA in mathematics. Patricia is a graduate of Hesston College where she received her AA in nursing. He will be teaching math and science at Flowers Cove and his wife will be working in a clinic there. Both are members of the Pleasant View Mennonite Church, Hydro, Okla.

Mary Rohrer, Wadsworth, Ohio, has volunteered for a one-year teaching assignment in Petites, Newfoundland. She will be teaching grades 1-8. Mary is a graduate of Goshen College with a BS in elementary education. Prior to volunteering for her term of service she had taught in Illinois and Ohio. She is a member of the Bethel Mennonite Church, Wadsworth, Ohio.

Margaret Roth, Elmira, Ont., has volunteered for a one-year teaching assignment in Toronto. She will be teaching in the Flemington Road Public School. Margaret is a graduate of Stratford Teachers' College and is a member of the Elmira Mennonite Church, Elmira, Ont.

Dale and Beatrice Shantz, Moorefield, Ont., have volunteered for a two-year term of service in Newfoundland. Dale is a graduate of Norwell District Secondary School and will be involved in community development work in Fortune, Newfoundland. Beatrice is a graduate of Stratford Teachers' College with an elementary school teaching certificate. She will be teaching in Fortune. Both are members of the Berea Mennonite Church, Alma, Ont.

Carol Wagner, New Hamburg, Ont., has volunteered for a one-year term of service in Toronto, Ont. She will be supervisor of the Lawrence Heights Day Care Centre. Carol is a graduate of Conestoga College where she received a diploma for early childhood education. She is a member of the Hillcrest Mennonite Church, New Hamburg, Ont.

Dissent Is Topic for GC's Kreider

In his opening chapel on Sept 11 Carl Kreider, acting president of Goshen College, told students "to be aware of the ills of their time and react strongly against them."

Drawing on the well-known story of Jesus and Barabbas as found in Mark 15:6-15, he pointed out that both were dissenters and because of their dissent were on trial for a capital offense: Barabbas for insurrection and murder; Jesus for blasphemy and treason.

But Jesus reacted to the conditions quite differently from Barabbas. The Barabbas reaction was self-seeking violence; his record was full of charges of insurrection and murder. Jesus' reaction was self-denying love.

Kreider urged students to avoid hypocrisy in their reactions to society's problem. Hypocrisy has been the besetting sin of the religious fanatic, whether scribe, Sad-ducee, or Pharisee of Jesus' day, Marxist of the 19th century, or student radical of the '70s, he pointed out.

Hypocrisy is present, Kreider said, when one condemns violence in Vietnam, but accepts it if used by Che Guevara in Cuba or Bolivia. Or, when one condemns violence that whites do to blacks, but condones violence blacks do to fellow blacks or blacks do to whites. "All violence is sin," he said, and suggested that students not forget Jesus' words to the Apostle Peter when he had, with good intentions, drawn his sword to protect Jesus.

Hypocrisy is also present, Kreider said, when one condemns industrial pollution, but personally uses tobacco and so pollutes his own body and the air about him, or carelessly litters the campus, or thoughtlessly destroys the grass by walking across it, or uses a car for short trips when walking or biking is possible without the fumes of the internal combustion engine.

Faculty and students must learn how to communicate their dissent more effectively. Again Kreider drew on similarities of Jesus and Barabbas, who were both effective communicators. The Bible says the people understood Jesus' message, but did not like it, and clamored for His crucifixion. The people also understood Barabbas' message; it offered a shortcut, it was more practical, and in the end it was he who was released.

Those who dissent are in good company, Kreider said. Not only do they have a model in Jesus of Nazareth, but also in the young university students who were at the forefront of the Anabaptist Reformation of the 16th century and the student volunteer movement in overseas missions in the early 20th century. Those early missionaries of the Mennonite Church were almost all Goshen College students, and their work shook the complacency of a church that was all too willing to be the "quiet of the land."

But, most important, Kreider emphasized, is that methods of dissent be consistent with the ultimate goals.

He said, "This probably means finding new methods. It is not enough to mount pious platitudes or to speak of agape love. We must find ways in which Christian love can be effectively expressed. It dare not be misunderstood -- either as spinlessness on one hand or as starry-eyed radicalism on the other. It was, after all, on methods that Jesus and Barabbas really parted company."

The Uyo Story

In The Uyo Story, Ed and Irene Weaver write a moving story of "mission" replacing "missions," of African realities breaking through to shape an emerging church, of paternalism being ended. Yet no disrespect is exhibited toward earlier missionary efforts.

Here are missionaries who believe that God guides in answer to prayer (p. 40) as His servants claim promises from the Scriptures (pp. 33, 51). Here is missionary reporting which combines the passionate dedication and courage of an earlier missionary era with the newer awareness of the place the independent church must now fill.

The Weavers try constantly to view life through the eyes of the African. One feels no condescension as they tell of the sacredness of communal land (p. 43) or of the problems which accompany an illiterate leadership (p. 46), the prestige factor vested in a cement-block building (p. 61), the African view of polygamy (p. 63), the way sacred and secular are blended (p. 68), applauding when consensus is reached (p. 77), communal sharing (p. 83). Forty denominations representing 225 congregations are located within a five-mile radius of Uyo.

In The Uyo Story the divisiveness of competing boards and agencies shows through in all its dissonance. The divisive tendencies of prophet-led independent churches appears too (p. 49), but the movement is respected because it so often portrays the uniqueness of the free, creative African spirit. The work of evangelism is placed, as it should be, in the midst of a reconciling and an ecumenical concern (p. 51), and in a supporting role of the indigenous church. The training of leaders is seen as the crucial role a missionary can still play.

Here, though simply told, is a true glimpse into the new shape of world mission in the non-Western, or at least the African, world.—Reviewed by Paul M. Miller, Goshen, Ind.

Missionary Explores Radio Possibilities

Larry and Helen Lehman, EMBMC missionaries in San Pedro Careha, Guatemala, are exploring the possibilities of using radio to reach the Kekchi Indians to whom they minister. TGJL, the 1000-watt radio station in Carcha, Guatemala, already airs some broadcasts in the Kekchi language. Larry hopes to gain wider acquaintance with the Kekchi people through radio exposure.

Arrangements were recently completed with TGJL for the Spanish broadcast Luz y Verdad (Light and Truth) on Tuesday and Friday evenings and Sunday morning. The station manager is making available the half hour on Sundays free of charge and will rebroadcast the two 15-minute tapes used on Tuesdays and Fridays.

Luz y Verdad is produced in Puerto Rico by Lester Hershey and is sponsored by Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., Harrisonburg, Va.

Jair Is Formed

A group of ten Mennonite men representing nine churches in eastern Lancaster-Berks County area have formed the Jair Community Services, Inc. (Jair was a son of Manasseh who built 23 cities in Gilgal).

Jair Community Services is incorporated in the state of Pennsylvania and has applied for nonprofit corporation status with the Internal Revenue Service. Jair is organized to provide opportunities for involvement in meeting community needs, such as housing, job training, counseling, and nursery care. In August an empty house was purchased in southside Reading, Pa., with the object of rehabilitating it. Contracts have already been let for plumbing and electrical work.

Donations, loans, or annuities are welcomed. For further information write: Jair Community Services, Inc., 317 South 7th Street, Reading, Pa. 19602.

EMC Enrolls 957

Eastern Mennonite College enrolled 957 students for its fall term, the largest number in its 52-year history, according to statistics released by Lester C. Shank, registrar.

College officials had anticipated a slight decrease from last year's fall enrollment of 918 because of more cancellations by prospective upperclassmen than usual. But last-minute registration, boosted by 52 part-time students, accounted for the 4 percent increase.

Mr. Shank pointed out that the number of students increased only slightly—from 901 in 1969 to 905 this year. Last year there were only 17 part-time students, about one third of the 1970 total of 52.

The full-time equivalency for the 1970 fall term is 922, said Mr. Shank. He explained that FTE is a method educators use to calculate enrollment by combining the number of credit hours taken by part-time students and dividing by the number of hours in a normal load for a full-time student.

EMC has experienced steady enrollment growth throughout the past decade, except for a slight decrease in 1964. The 1970 FTE of 922 represents an 89 percent increase over the 1960 fall FTE of 499.

While the number of college seniors dropped from 198 last year to 180 in 1970 and the number of juniors remained almost exactly at 196, both the freshman and sophomore classes increased their size. The freshman class numbers 292; the sophomore class, 236.

Eastern Mennonite Seminary, with a three-year program leading to the Master of Divinity degree, showed a 33 percent increase in its fall enrollment. The seminary enrolled 28 full-time students and one part-time student. Last year 21 students registered as seminary students.

Fifteen students are auditing courses, 14 of these in the college.

EMC students received more than $1 million in financial aid last year, approximately half of this amount distributed by various states as loans. College officials expect that students will receive an equal, if not greater, amount in 1970-71.

Groundbreaking for Beth-Haven Nursing Home

Groundbreaking ceremonies for the new Beth-Haven Nursing Home were held on the building site at 2500 Pleasant Street, Hannibal, Mo., at 2:30 p.m., Sun., Sept. 20. Edward P. Mininger, Chairman of the Health and Welfare Committee of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., spoke on behalf of the Mennonite Church. The principal address was given by Representative William L. Hungate, Ninth District Congressman from Missouri.

The new home, a 60-bed professional nursing home, is being built by Mennonite Home Association of Hannibal. Peter E. Hartman is administrator.
September VS Orientation Held

Forty-two young volunteers reported to their assignments under Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions’ Voluntary Service program. The youth participated in an orientation to the VS program Sept. 21-25 at Eastern Board’s Salunga headquarters.

Seminars and workshops with such titles as “What We Believe,” “Poverty and Welfare,” and “The Black Experience in America” all focused on problems and concerns facing the VS-ers on their jobs.

A commissioning service was held on Sept. 26 at McCaskey High School, Lancaster, Pa., in conjunction with the Mennonite Central Committee fiftieth anniversary meeting being held there. Raymond Charles, Eastern Board president, gave the commissioning charge. The group was commissioned for the following assignments:

Front row: Patricia Jenkins, Dawsonville, Md., child care worker for eight-month term in Homestead, Fla.; Linda Beitzel, Pooesville, Md., child care worker for eight months in Homestead, Fla.; Norma Huber, Lititz, Pa., one year in Birmingham, Ala., in community service agency; Nancy Herr, Strasburg, Pa., child care worker for eight months in Homestead, Fla.; Lorraine Landis, Harleysville, Pa., in Atlanta, Ga., for one year as community service worker; Carolyn Miller, Lancaster, Pa., community service worker for one year at Friendship Flat, Washington, D.C.; Judy Bender, Harrisonburg, Va., one-year term at Johns Island, S.C., as community youth worker; Mary Grace Zimmer, Elizabethtown, Pa., child care worker for eight months in Homestead, Fla.

Report on 1970 Christmas Bundles

July and August reports from the five Mennonite Central Committee material aid centers indicate that 62,000 Christmas bundles are packed and ready for overseas shipments. This is an increase of 5,000 bundles over the number shipped in 1969. The Christmas bundle project started in 1946 when 15,000 bundles were shipped to 12 countries. The year 1970 is the twenty-fifth year of Christmas bundle shipments and the fiftieth anniversary of MCC. The Christmas bundle program is half as old as MCC. A total of 807,000 bundles have been received by MCC over the past 25 years. Arrangements are being made to ship 40,000 of the 1970 bundles to Bolivia, Haiti, Honduras, Hong Kong, Jordan, and Vietnam. During the 1970s it is hoped that the giving of Christmas bundles will average between 50,000 and 60,000 annually. Further, MCC is encouraging congregations to consider this project as one for their children and thus help them that we as Christians really care about other people, including children. It is also hoped that the quality of the items in the Christmas bundles will continue to improve each year. It is necessary that we teach our children to give to others of their material best, as well as a cup of cold water.
Lancaster School
Began 29th Year

Lancaster Mennonite High School began its twenty-ninth year of operation on Sept. 2, 1970, with the enrollment of 481 pupils. The pupils were preceded by the 38 faculty members who met for two days of orientation on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1.

As J. Lester Brubaker of Harrisonburg, Va., assumed the principalship, the school again noted with deep appreciation the service given by Noah G. Good as academic head of the school during its first twenty-eight years. Brother Good continues to serve on the faculty as a language teacher. Myron Dietz is again Assistant Principal, a position he held last year.

The new administration was preceded by a revision of the school’s constitution in March 1970, and a reorganization of the Board of Trustees in July. Whereas previously the entire board met monthly, the new board will meet only quarterly, with the Executive Committee meeting monthly. James H. Hess, Chairman; Lloyd Eby, Assistant Chairman; Raymond Landis, Secretary; Ray Yost, Treasurer; Jacob Nauman; John Harnish; and Shelly Shellenberger comprise the board’s Executive Committee.

New among the student body is Miss Shabnam Mussarat Mall, a Pakistani girl. Doni, as she prefers to be called, is a member of the Methodist Church in Pakistan and is in the junior class at LMHS. Also a part of the student body are Linda, Larry, and Lee Stoltzfus, the first triplets ever to be enrolled in the school. They are juniors and the children of Mr. and Mrs. John J. Stoltzfus of Elveron, Pa.

During the summer a new athletic field was constructed, financed by the nearly $20,000 raised by a student drive in the spring. This year the Student Council hopes to raise additional money for the completion of the athletic field and for other campus improvements.

New in the school’s curriculum this year is a ninth-grade course in earth science, replacing the general science course which had previously been taught. Bro. Brubaker, Principal, cited continuing curriculum development as one of the major areas of emphasis for the current school year.

J. C. Wenger, Goshen, Ind., at Olive, Jamestown, Ind., Nov. 15-18.

Michigan Relief Sale, Sept. 28, netted $70,548.10 for MCC. The sale of apple butter brought in over $1,900.

Noah Hochstetler was ordained for the Roselawn Mennonite Church, Elkhart, Ind., on Oct. 4. He had been serving as pastor previously.

Spiritual Renewal Emphasis at Trinity Mennonite Church, Glendale, Ariz., Nov. 22-25, with Howard Zehr as speaker.

Revival meetings at the Allenville Mennonite Church, Allenville, Pa., Oct. 25-Nov. 1, with Willard Mayer, Irwin, Ohio.

Le Bon Livre Bookstore in Luxembourg enjoyed record September sales. For the year sales are running about 25 percent above last year. "The sale of Scriptures has been very gratifying," reports Eastern Board worker Harvey Miller.

Menno Travel Service is planning its annual Managers’ Meeting for Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 26 and 27. The meeting is being held in South America this year in order to help familiarize managers with that area of the world prior to the Mennonite World Conference scheduled for Curitiba, Brazil, in July 1972.

The Sugar Creek Mennonite Church, Wayland, Iowa, has set aside the weekend of June 26 and 27, 1971, to commemorate the centennial of the congregation. Those who once lived and worshiped here are invited to come.

New members by baptism: two at Smithville Mennonite Church, Smithville, Ohio; two at Northside Mennonite Church, Lima, Ohio; one at Kalispell, Mont.; one at Holdeman Mennonite Church, Wakarusa, Ind.; one at Kidron Mennonite Church, Kidron, Ohio; two on confession of faith at the Scottsdale Mennonite Church, Scottsdale, Pa.

Mr. Richard H. Crockett of Morton, Ill., has been appointed to Manager, Trade Sales for Herald Press. Mr. Crockett joined Herald Press on Sept. 8, 1970. He is a graduate of Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., with majors in history and music. He has worked for Tazewell Publications, Morton, Ill., as a columnist and darkroom technician; and as a student was employed for two years by the Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library.

Mr. Crockett will be responsible for the promotion of Herald Press books to trade customers via advertising, conventions, and sales calls.

Couples’ Retreat at Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Salunga, Pa., Nov. 14. Wilbur and Lois Eber will be serving with William and Ruth Yovanovich. The cost per couple is $10 which includes three meals, two talks on "Experiencing God Together," sharing groups, silent meditation. Make this a memorable day for you by planning to attend. Contact Mrs. Ruth Hershey, R. 3, Lititz, Pa. 17543, or phone 717-626-3549. Registration limited to 35 couples.

Robert Bishop, Doylestown, Pa., arrived safely in Caracas, Venezuela, on Oct. 9 for a 27-month teaching assignment at the Colegio Americano as an Overseas Mission Associate with Mennonite Board of Missions.

Missionaries coming on furlough during November and December, 1970: John and Isabelle Blough, Brazil; Don and Marilyn Brenneman, Argentina; Albert and Lois Buckwalter, Argentina; Harvey and Miriam Graber, Brazil; Warren and Janice Lumbright, Ghana; Floyd and Aluce Sieber, Argentina; Mario and Egda Snyder, Argentina.

Readers Say

Thanks for printing "The Most Heresy," by Arnold Cressman in the Sept. 8 issue. A few years ago our congregation switched to all Herald Press materials, and for good reasons. We were encountering material that taught baptismal regeneration, too many war stories in the youth papers, and a lack of emphasis on Christ-motivated discipleship.

As a pastor I agree with Arnold Cressman, the extra cost of quality material, given an Anabaptist perspective, to the Christian life, is well worth it. For example, I feel the new kindergarten material is superb! I'm for being loyal to our Publishing House, and Bro. Drescher, thanks for a great Gospel Herald.

—Kenneth E. Nauman, Homestead, Fla.

The article, "From Grandson to Son," in the 10/6/70 issue reminded us again of some deep problems that many persons are struggling with in our brotherhood. Nothing could be more frustrating and discouraging than to have our experience with God wanting. Joseph Hertzler suggests that the fault lies in the wrong age of responding to Christ, wrong age of baptism, and wrong age of uniting with the church. This answer is too simple. To end the discussion at this point is merely avoiding the issue. The following should help to clarify my criticism.

Growing up in a mission setting, I can name you persons ranging in ages from 17 to 70 who went through similar experiences as that of Hertzler in his book. Were they old enough for an agenda? This is not merely a problem of youth. Thank God, brother Hertzler, you were young when you began. Many adults have not found the courage to try again. There are those who responded to Christ at an early age, and went on with the agenda, and had a healthy growing experience. A frustrating experience of my own was waiting until I was old enough to make a commitment. I am still baffled with that hypothesis. Is there something wrong with me? Have I been deceived?

No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him to me” (Jn. 6:44, TEV). Why did the Spirit draw persons in the first place, if they were too young? I deplore going back into bondage of the law, where there is an automatic age and time. Where is our freedom and flexibility? Why try to hinder the Holy Spirit in doing His thing in His way? Have not His methods always been unpredictable? Am I wrong to plead for flexibility in age? Isn’t it true what is good for one person may be disrespectful to another?

I contend that the problem with unstable experiences relates much closer to our educational program than to the time of agenda. I know of no reliable program that assures a person, regardless of age, a healthy growing experience. But then, can such a program be developed? There are factors far more important than the agenda in promoting a helpful program such as:

Adults becoming stable in Christ and centering their priorities around Him. This is a sermon in itself but necessary for the next point to be possible.

A home educational program where parents with children will (a) pray together, (b) study the Word together, (c) share their frustrations together, (d) find forgiveness together, (e) make Christian living a family program, and (f) grow in Christ together.

This was the educational program of the early Anabaptists. This should be included in the life of the twentieth-century Anabaptists too. I believe it will assist Christians of all ages to move through those first years of decision with normal growth. —Leonard D. Hershey, Volant, Pa.

Me Be Grateful?

By Levi Keidel

I ate my usual breakfast of oatmeal and dried milk, brushed my teeth with a glass of boiled water, picked up my freshly packed battered suitcase, and with two Congolese co-workers piled into the loaded literature van.

"Have you heard of any more fighting?" I asked, as I threaded the heavy van onto a rough dirt road leading southwest out of the city.

"They say many villages have been burned to the ground," replied Barnabas. "But the soldiers are in control, and the rebels have fled to the forest."

"People no longer give rebels support like they once did," added Boniface. "Ever since independence came four years ago we have suffered. People are tired of war."

We never took the van into an area where we knew there was trouble. Civil war had just raged across an area 75 miles southeast of us. In its aftermath, people were beginning to emerge from hiding in the forest. A pastor was among them. He had written us a letter: "Please come with the book truck to our village of Tshintshianku. Bibles and hymnbooks have been destroyed in the fighting. People are weeping for new ones."

The truck slowly ground its way through a sandpit. Then tires edged their way over huge round stones protruding above the roadbed. The steering wheel tried to wrench itself from my grasp. The truck body twisted and groaned in complaint.

Tshintshianku was such a pleasant village, I recalled. Huts for its 1,000 people lined the approaches to an important road intersection and nestled on adjacent slopes. Tall stately palm trees, their trunks flocked with light green fernery, lined the roads with a natural disorderliness that was beautiful.

The palms framed scenes of domestic tranquillity. Clean paths lined with blooming canna or zinnia led to the huts. Hut walls were of red earth, their doors of rough-sawn lumber, their roofs of neatly-trimmed thatch. These were cherished homes around which the activities of families centered.

There was a mother pounding manioc flour under a banana tree in the backyard. A baby was tied to her back, reverse-papoose fashion, asleep with the rocking of her body as she rhythmically bent at her waist to drive pestle into mortar again and again. A hen and chicks scurried at her feet, pecking at particles which fell to the ground. Two older children sat playing on a reed mat which lay on the bare ground nearby. A tethered goat contentedly mulched lush grass in the front yard.

My mental picture was soon to be shattered. About sundown that evening we entered the village and approached the intersection. I was numbed by the sight. The palms remained, mute witnesses to the devastation.

Not a home was left standing. Every hut had been reduced to a heap of broken earth. From the rubble, sticks which had been part of the wall structure jutted upward, their ends burned to ugly black twisted points. The landscape was deserted of anything living. The scene overwhelmed me with a sense of utter desolation.

"Do you think we'll find any people?" I asked.

"Let's go on to the house of the pastor who wrote us the letter," Barnabas replied.

We drove through the road intersection to the opposite edge of town. There was the road which arched off to the left and circled in front of the church. There was the church; it was built of cement block with a corrugated metal roof; it was intact.

But the parsonage hut to the left of it had been reduced to a heap of rubble like all the others. To the right of the church was an old hut, walls near its corner entryway crumbling from either age or warfare; its tattered thatch roof, black with age, tipped toward the entryway like a lopsided hat ready to fall.

"Where could the pastor be?" I asked, as I braked the truck to a stop in front of the church.

Then in the gray of gathering dusk I saw him, stooped low to clear the edge of the tipped-over roof, emerging from the broken entryway. Then followed his wife. He straightened to his full height, smiled broadly, waved a welcome, and called, "Hello, preacher!"

They insisted we stay for the night. They found chunks of log for us to sit on until they could borrow chairs. She hunted something for us to eat, and found three white sweet potatoes. She put them into what appeared to be her only cooking utensil . . . a shallow white enamel dish. She covered them with water and set them to cook on an open fire nearby.

The flat-bottomed basket she used to carry things on her head was turned upside down on the ground at our feet; its upturned bottom was to be our table. She drained the water off the sweet potatoes and set them before us. She said grace and ate our supper.

It was eleven o'clock when we retired that night. The pastor and his wife recounted to us in detail the terrible events of past weeks. They had fled to the forest carrying what they could in their hands. They’d lost virtually everything. Their spirit overwhelmed me. Through the course of the entire evening, not a word of complaint fell from their lips. Rather, they praised God that their bodies were unharmed, they had each other, and they could start building again.

And this was the third time they’d passed through such an experience in the last four years.

Some months later my car was speeding down a highway in the midwestern United States. I had just returned from the Congo, and was still adjusting to such accoutrements of an affluent society as instant balanced-diet breakfasts, tooth paste with sex appeal, and soft-cushioned machines rocketing along ribbons of smooth cement. I was also perusing the beauty of lush green fields of corn which lined the highway . . . fields which I knew had unfailingly produced a generous harvest for more than 30 consecutive years. There was a farmer working in a hayfield. “Aren’t those big cab tractors nice,” I mused. “And look at his shiny pickup.”

I pulled into a filling station for gas. A farmer had also stopped. I struck up a conversation with him.

“Crops look great,” I said, gesturing to a nearby freshly tasseled cornfield.

“We’re hurting bad for rain,” he replied. “Haven’t had any for two weeks now. If we don’t get some soon, the crop’s going to be short this year.” Instantly on the screen of my mind there flashed the picture of an impoverished pastor and his wife seated at a night bonfire telling their story. It raised a question which has been uncomfortably nagging me ever since.

Why is it that people who have so little find it so easy to be grateful, and we who have so much find it so easy to complain?

In Remembrance of Me

By Ruth Y. Hackman

After all these years, I should forget the whole unhappy incident. But I saw his widow again tonight and the whole nightmare went before me like a movie. It was much too vivid.

“Yes,” she said, “George is gone eighteen years now. You know, Ruth, I’ll be eighty-eight in October.”

I couldn’t believe it. George gone eighteen years and Ida eighty-eight? It didn’t seem long ago that George put a drop leaf on an old bureau so I could use it for a Bathinette. Of course “baby” Jenny is in college now.

George and Ida had lived in a garage that had been remodeled into a cozy little home. When George had his heart attack, my husband (Walter) moved their lawn.

George was not a member of our Mennonite Church—that is the main trunk. He was a member of one of the branches. Since our church was nearer to his home, he attended our church faithfully. He never ceased having a testimony for his Lord. He had been a drunkard and the Lord had mercy on him and saved him.

As I sat beside Ida, tonight, I wondered if she remembered. She was so glad to see me though.

“I didn’t feel too good today,” she interrupted, “and I thought I wouldn’t come. But I wanted to see you.”

We were seated around decorated tables—some on folding chairs, some on wheelchairs. We played games, we sang old favorites. Our WMSA ladies were entertaining the elderly folks from the Good Shepherd Home, where Ida was now a guest. There was lots of cake and punch. We were laughing and having fun.

Underneath this gaiety, I was looking back in retrospect at that heart-pounding experience that happened in this very room. Eighteen years ago this room had been our church auditorium.

It happened at communion. They tried to explain to George that he was surely welcome at our church and we certainly enjoyed his fellowship. But since he didn’t “belong” to our group he couldn’t take communion. (I forgot to tell you he came faithfully to prayer meeting, too.) Brother George, as he wanted us to call him, could not understand.

It’s wretched. I know, to hope that people won’t show up at church on a Sunday morning, especially Communion Sunday. My hoping was to no avail. Sunday came and George was there. He sat on the right side and Ida on the left.

It is not necessary that I go into this drama-packed scene, except to tell you this: when George reached for the bread he was refused by these words, “I’m sorry, sir.”

In the midst of that communion service, George left the bench, motioned to Ida, and they went out that door never to come to our services again.

Tonight as Ida left our party, she shook my hand and kissed me. “Tell Walter to come and see me sometime,” she said pleadingly.

I Learned to Love (and Cry) at Youth Convention 1970

By Albert Zehr

Mennonite Youth Convention 70 wasn’t just for young people. At least here’s one adult who still can’t get over what happened there. While this writer has attended conventions and conferences from the East to the West coast, never did one get through quite like Youth Convention at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina. To put it in brief, most mass meetings appear to be idea-fests but this was a happening!

While on most occasions we seem to try to convince each other, here somehow we started to love each other and wow, what a difference.

I’m still trying to figure out what did it, but it’s beyond me. When Don Jacobs began to breathe fresh life into those Old Testament characters they got up and walked among us and you could feel them live and love and letting God live through them each in their own stumbling way. Before long, you felt they were like you and me and why on earth can’t I be like that? Maybe I can! After you add to that the soul experiences of Laurence Hart and Manuela Garcia and then turn Tom Skinner loose, well, even those of us who have intellectualized everything from peace to piety either have to run or get bowled over.

When hundreds of young people respond to a simple invitation: “Do you want Christ to take over your life and live in you?” you better believe something is going on. Fortunately, during this time some of this is getting through here and this fellow feels himself really beginning to love and other, beginning to sense their sincerity and needs. For the next three days something takes over. First we see a youth whose face reflects need. This is followed by an urge to touch his or her arm or shoulder with a word of concern or interest. Almost inevitably within ten minutes or a few hours the youth would come back and ask to talk. Usually beginning with the question, “How did you know how I felt?”

This would be followed by a period of beautiful sharing and sense of oneness. The almost inevitable first statement being, “I just don’t seem to really feel close to God, I just can’t sense that I am forgiven.”

As the youth would share and lay his life open, somehow God gave me the overpowering ability to love and accept that person, to laugh and to cry with him, and even the power to say very little, keeping my intellectual and Bible answers to a minimum. After a time of sharing the youth would say, “Hey, this is beautiful, I feel great, you’ve helped me so much. For the first time God’s becoming real to me.” After further sharing I could only say, “You’re a wonderful person, go and tell someone else about it.”

Suddenly the incarnation became much clearer to me. I can and must verify and become a channel of God’s love. He can come to others through me. What a beautiful experience. The best way to help someone to meet Christ is to love and accept him, but that can only happen as He does it through me. Well, so that’s what this “Share Your Christ You” is all about!

To maintain this level of sharing and experience for a week and then for over twenty hours on a returning bus can’t help but affect one’s life.

On the following Sunday morning the youth at our church and many others shared. Many adults and parents understood, some didn’t. But the spark which ignited into full flame at Convention will not be put out.

And this brings me to some solemn thoughts which sober me. I feel that this Convention will be a milestone in the history of the Mennonite Church. Many youth were changed and openly committed themselves to Christ. We experienced an outpouring of the Spirit seldom seen in our day, a new degree of freedom and openness. Freedom to share and to express yet, an atmosphere of love and respect. That’s all good, but I’m not sure the churches can take it! How the churches responded when these youth came back from Convention may well determine the future of our church.

I can only see our youth doing one of three things at this point. First and hopefully they will share and find warmth and acceptance in their home church. They will help to promote in their churches and find the openness and freedom which they have tasted. A second possibility will be that they will not find acceptance. They will find those in their church not free to share and be open, and thus will have to find other groups or fellowships where they can find meaningful fellowship which is so vital to a continuing and growing faith. A third and most unfortunate possibility may be that after attempting to share and being rebuffed and squelched, they become discouraged and abandon their faith and hope because they do not see the incarnation continuing in their home church.

If the first does not happen we may see a mass exodus from the Mennonite Church in the next decade. Frankly, Convention leaves me excited but also uneasy.

An Old-New Method

I cannot forget what Martin Marty told a group of us some years ago. This outstanding church historian and theologian said that at the times when the church is most lifeless spiritually it puts its primary emphasis in building great edifices. The great cathedrals were built during the Dark Ages.

So also, Marty said, often when a congregation is dead, it must somehow prove to itself and others it is alive. The easiest way to do this without costly commitment, discipleship, or moving into mission is to build a bigger or more beautiful building even if its membership and mission hasn’t grown for twenty years.

Of course exceptions can be pointed out. Yet who has not felt uneasy about the amount of money the Christian church has poured into brick and mortar the last few decades? Even with decreasing membership many churches poured millions into bigger and more beautiful buildings as if people are won by buildings.

During the past few decades when the needs of people physically, spiritually, and socially were seeking to be heard the church structured its sanctuaries so that the individual feels even more lonely and often organized its life and worship to be more formal and ritualistic. The church seems to build larger churches in which to hide from the world at the very time the world is crying most for the church’s presence. It finds it easier to invest in stone than in the welfare of people.

What would really happen if we would take the article on page 918 of this issue seriously. It is a good article to discuss in your Sunday school class or congregation. What would happen if the members of your congregation met for worship, Bible study, and discussion in homes with a small nucleus of members on a regular weekly basis? Neighbors would feel free to enter into the meeting and the discussion. More personal and meaningful involvement could come about. Perhaps in this way we would again find the mission of the church rather than just hear it talked about.

Then, at appointed times the members of a congregation (perhaps once a month) gather in a group at the church building or town hall to share what God is doing to receive new guidance and encouragement to move ahead. Here is where the preaching is done. The pastor’s primary work now is to move among the members and their meetings as a real shepherd, giving guidance, spiritual instruction, and seeking to help answer questions which arise. But the ministry of preaching to the world, visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, and speaking God’s truth to the community is now properly and primarily lodged with the members of the church.

This seems to be more in keeping with the method of the early church. Paul and other leaders moved among groups which gathered in homes. The Scripture says they moved from house to house encouraging and instructing the saints who carried on the Christian witness. History seems to say that when the saints start to build church buildings in which to meet they are really settling for a separate, uninvolved spiritual existence, apart from the world. Such have given up their call to minister and desire only to be ministered to.

Perhaps some congregation which takes its ministry seriously will study and seek to follow what seems a New Testament practice. Perhaps no present congregation could be totally involved in dividing up into house churches. Some loyal members might become very disturbed if small groups met in their homes and didn’t show up at every service planned at the church building. There would still be need for regular services at the church building for those members who don’t desire to share in a house-church experience and for the house-church members to report back what God is doing and receive spiritual refreshment on a regular basis.

Even if not every member becomes involved, congregations must start somewhere in fulfilling the mission of the church in the community. Might such an experience revive many a member to a new appreciation of the meaning of Christ today? Might such an experience prove to be the spark to put new fire under many a minister’s calling to preach, teach, and equip others for the work of ministering?

Careful planning would be needed to keep such groups from deteriorating into book reviews and mere get-together sessions. Here is where a pastor’s spiritual insight, courage, and commitment could contribute much.

Without doubt people inside and outside the church are seeking for more personal relationships and involvement. In every area today people are depersonalized. If the church fails in giving worth to the individual and putting meaning into life where people play and work it might as well close its doors because it will be out of business in a short time no matter how many new and big beautiful buildings it erects.

Perhaps God is calling us in a particular way to answer the cry of people’s hearts for more personal relationships and involvement by telling us to move, like the early church, in making our homes places of Bible study and prayer. Perhaps the Spirit is urging us to scatter the church by meeting in small groups as believers with the primary purpose to incorporate our neighbors and our friends with whom we work. Perhaps Christ’s promise to be where two or three of His children meet has particular pertinence today.

The Church Building

By Alberto Barrientos

A careful search of the New Testament leaves us with no indication whether the early Christians used buildings "consecrated" to the Lord as places of worship. There is no trace of such a term as "building fund." Neither did the words "church" (congregation) and "temple" (church building) exist as synonyms. And we should remember that chronologically the New Testament extends up to the last decade of the first century. Geographically, it takes in the Middle East, Asia Minor, and part of Europe. Culturally, it comprises the Jewish, Greek, and Roman civilizations, all of which, though not Christian, were indeed deeply religious, and profusely equipped with temples and altars.

T. S. Nee, contemporary evangelical writer who has shaken Christian thought, says, "The first apostles were Jews, and the Jewish tendency to build special places of worship was natural to them. Had Christianity required that places be set apart for the specific purpose of worshiping the Lord, the early apostles with their Jewish background and natural tendencies would have been ready enough to build them. The amazing thing is that not only did they not put up special buildings but they seem to have ignored the whole subject intentionally. It is Judaism, not Christianity, which teaches that there must be sanctified places for divine worship." 1

Rather, one finds frequently in the apostolic writings, reference to the "church in your house," or "the church which is in your house" (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Philem. v. 2; Col. 4:15). About this, Nee writes, "Everything must begin at the beginning. When a church is founded, the believers from the very outset must learn to meet by themselves, either in their own homes or in some other building which they are able to secure. Of course, not every church is a church in a 'house,' but a church in a 'house' should be encouraged rather than considered as a drawback. If the number of believers is great and the sphere of the locality wide, they might need to meet, as the saints in Jerusalem did, in different 'houses' instead of in one house." 2 In another paragraph, Nee adds: "Somehow, as soon as people enter these special buildings, they involuntarily settle down to passivity, and wait to be preached to. A family atmosphere should pervade all gathering of the children of God, so that the brothers even feel free to ask questions..."

Further, the meetings in believers' homes can be a fruitful testimony to the neighbors around, and they provide an opportunity for witness and gospel preaching." 3

After the apostolic century, the church began to include a series of new elements in its bloodstream. Muirhead says that in the period from AD 100 to 323, "Christians began to erect houses devoted exclusively to worship, which they called 'churches,' 'houses of God,' and 'houses of prayer.'" 4

Besides, "they tried to make the worship service ever more liturgical and full of pomp. It consisted of songs, Scripture reading, prayers, and preaching." 5

Today, not only does our vocabulary "church" identify the congregation with the building, but we cannot think of the existence of the former apart from the place of the latter.

There are actually missionary and evangelical church organizations who to "begin a work" first put up a building, which they call "The X Church," and only later do they devote themselves to the job of raising up that which is really the church. In some countries which have been characterized by their interest in sending missionaries, sometimes the fever to construct sanctuaries leaves no money to carry on missionary work — though the congregations may contract debts running into the millions to put up church buildings that are little used.

In Latin American circles the situation is even more serious. Many churches have big budgets for construction but cannot pay their pastor. The height of this phenomenon is the case which can be seen in many places — large, luxurious temples with shamefully needy congregations.

To sum up: Doctrinally and historically, church buildings are not an essential characteristic of New Testament Christianity, nor are they indispensable for the development of the church.
A Means or an End?

The primitive church grew and developed steadily without buildings, but today with them, the outlook isn't so encouraging. Common sense would seem to demand that in spite of present patterns, we ought to make a sane and wholesome consideration of the attitude of evangelicals toward church buildings, of the building of them, and a functional remodeling of these buildings in relation to the mission of the church.

Does the church's God-given mission define the construction and use of buildings—or do the buildings themselves determine the manner in which the mission is to be carried out?

Obviously the first question is the correct one. But this is the simplistic approach. A more careful examination can lead to the conclusion that the means—in this case the church buildings—that were suitable at one time not only become antiquated, inappropriate, and inefficient, but also become the ends in themselves, and as such, the determining factors. On the other hand, we need to recognize that in many cases the means employed affect the message. Thus, although the church building is a means to accomplish certain ends, such as fellowship, nurture, evangelization, it is possible that the building itself because of its size, location, shape, and the number and characteristics of those who attend, soon determines what activities are carried on, and how. In other words, the bricks or the wood arranged in a certain way determine what will be the attitude of the people and their method of communication, from the pulpit or among the members.

This is not mere theory. It's enough to look clearly at reality. Isn't it true that buildings have helped to determine how the church carries out its mission? Isn't the general evangelical custom of "campaigns" or "revivals" almost the only form of evangelistic work? The building has caused the church to reverse a New Testament principle.

While the Lord says to the church, "Go," the church, peacefully seated in its comfortable pews, says to the world, "Come to our building."

Hasn't the building itself imposed a system of monologue communication? Hasn't it brought about the formalizing of worship in such a way that everyone knows the order by heart?

The building has clearly affected the expression of the believers. Inside the building, one should maintain silence and an attitude of respect; there are many things one cannot do, thus creating an atmosphere very suitable for giving the appearance of a reality that doesn't exist. One goes to church in his finest clothes; he uses his "other" holiness, not the genuine one of Monday or Friday, the one of the field of sports (especially when he's losing), or the one from his working day, when the boss isn't looking. Thus the factor of the building, added to certain religious presuppositions, has created elements contrary to revealed truth.

The common concept of sacred temples has a double heritage. On the one hand, it is Hebrew: the idea of the temple and later of the synagogues. On the other hand is the Roman influence. Either way, these are exotic ideas for the Christian church of today.

Think of the many times that a church building could be used as a center of help to the community, to provide medical assistance, a literacy center, or a place for marriage counseling. But nothing like this can be done because it is considered irreverent. It's strange that the Christian mentality is such that it is ready to tie up great sums of money in a building, but cannot use it for the welfare of people, as if God would be offended at such use. As if one's love for his neighbor were contrary to his love for God!

Could the general strategy of centralizing all spiritual activity in the church be the reason for very slow growth? Could it also be the reason that fellowship among the believers is so weak? Is the building responsible for producing so many "Christian performers" with very little to offer people outside the building?

One can argue against the foregoing through the example given by certain "elephant" churches, defined that way only because of their size. This is the case of some Pentecostal-type churches. But although their activity revolves around the church, their liturgy — according to some observers — seems to fulfill a true purpose. It is criticized for being "noisy" and "disorderly." Nevertheless, the atmosphere offers an opportunity for fellowship and worship among the faithful. So the liturgy tends to cancel out the influence which the building has.

It's well to ask whether mere growth of a church means that it is fulfilling its mission. Yes, it may be, but perhaps only partially. The commission given by God to the church is more than mere growth. It is to "go into all the world"; it is to "go to every creature," as the church did at the beginning. Every day in the temple and in the homes, they taught and preached about Jesus Christ. Certain worship services can be very attractive to certain people, and this produces growth, but that doesn't mean that it is necessarily carrying out the task which God has assigned to it. Therefore the example of these churches continues to be questionable.

From another viewpoint, large non-Pentecostal churches show a certain satisfaction and pride in their size and little concern to grow further. In fact, generally in united evangelistic efforts, these churches move slowly and reluctantly. The influence of material prosperity — as seen in the building — is very clear. On the other hand, relationships among the believers do not appear to be very rich and fruitful. Thus, the congregation-building combination shows that the second is not as neutral as it would seem. The impression is quite clear that the building plays a decisive role.

Today's society, with its many activities and the intense effort required to gain a daily living, seems to call for the development of churches in private homes. But, given the situation imposed by history and the ecclesiastical system which prevails, it is hard to think of going back—or rather, forward.

The church of today must seek a solution, a synthesis, combining what exists with the guidelines laid down in the New Testament.

Here are some alternatives. It's clear that the church's evangelistic function ought to be decentralized away from the church building, as a first step. Both theology and strategy demand this. The building should be used to prepare the people of God for the work they are called to do daily, in the situation in which God has placed each member. As long as we keep insisting on "meetings" and evangelistic "campaigns" inside the church buildings as practically the only method of operation, Christians will continue to miss their great privilege of evangelizing, and the church will continue to stagnate in its growth.

These meetings and campaigns must be exchanged for the personal, daily testimony of each believer. Such meetings should be supplanted by well-planned meetings in the homes, not with the formality of church services, but rather with the spontaneity that grows out of a neighborly relationship. The emphasis on evangelization within the church building should be superseded by a programmed and systematic ministry of house-to-house visitation. In this case, the building can be a strong training center, and meetings should have this purpose. And there should be meetings in public places, where open discussion can take place. Not so many traditional mass meetings, however, because communication there is impersonal and yields little fruit.

Evangelistic meetings in church buildings ought to give way to the presence of the church in strategic places — plazas, shopping centers, parks, public halls, and auditoriums.

This is what Paul did. He sought the people where they were, set forth the truth, and invited discussion, because the truth brings men's thoughts unto obedience to Christ. The church today contents itself with giving out a sermon, a monologue from a pulpit, as if divine truth had to be entrenched so as not to be opposed by other ideas. The farther the truth of God gets away from the pulpit and approaches souls in sin, the more effective it will be. Evangelistic meetings in church buildings ought to be substituted by sending missionaries into areas where there is no work — not only missionaries with fair skins and automobiles either, but with brown skins, going on foot or on bicycles.

It's evident that the building will always have an evangelistic function, but it should be of a secondary, almost accidental nature. This would be in the case of persons who faithfully come to hear a sermon or take part in activities. We should not think that every time a nonbelieving person is present we have to shoot an evangelistic sermon at him! Some churches today customarily ask if any persons are visiting who do not know the Lord. These people are then taken to a place apart, where Christ is presented to them. Meanwhile, the main meeting continues as planned.

If evangelistic meetings are held inside the building, the type of meeting should definitely be changed. When those who do not know the Lord come to the church service, each song, chorus and special number which does not actually make an appropriate contribution is confusing to them. These people have come to hear the Word. Therefore, the traditional meeting form should be set aside, and place be given at once to the message, so that time might be allowed for questions and for dialogue with those who are interested. Sometimes the whole meeting seems to be a preparation of the right "atmosphere," instead of giving place to the Holy Spirit by means of the Word.

The ordinary meetings of the church in its building ought to provide an opportunity for a more natural, a warmer relationship one with another, a true "communion of saints" as in the early church, and less formalism and sense of reverence, which has become a veritable evangelical cult.

Even the Lord’s Supper seems to have lost something of its original meaning. It arouses feelings of awe, fear, and a quasi-sanctity. Without yielding to extremes, let me say that it was not that way in the early church. It was a true love feast. People ate, talked freely in the presence of the triune God, and the building did not impose on them a negative feeling. If the building which cost the believers so much is to be used, it ought to be used in the best way possible—not according to exotic and worldly patterns, but according to the spirit of the Book of Acts.

The rational use of the building requires the adoption of forms that permit a better communication of ideas. The monologue is classic in the evangelical church—the sermon. It’s the easy, professional way. And at the same time it is the opium which has created sleeping believers, with dreams of heaven but no place on earth. Inside the building it’s essential to employ methods of communication that are more penetrating and effective—such as dialogues, dramatizations, round-table discussions, debates, group studies, film showings of an evangelical nature that will provoke discussions.

Better participation on the part of everyone present should be constantly sought, and more expression given to spiritual gifts.

As in the Corinthian church: “What then, brethren? When you come together, every one has a psalm, teaching, an ecstatic utterance, a revelation, an interpretation. Let it all be for your mutual edification” (1 Cor. 14:26), and of course, “decently and in order” (v. 40).

The weekly prayer and Bible study meetings ought to be supplemented by meetings in homes, in the manner of cell-meetings. Churches that are practicing this have a great deal to teach to others. To centralize these activities in a building today, given the circumstances in which we are living, is not the most effective way. Cells are worth experimenting with.

The building or temple ought to have a community projection—that is, it should serve the community in which it is located. It's hard to believe that the Lord would feel offended simply because the worship center is used for giving injections, distributing food, or teaching illiterates to read. The exact opposite would seem to be the case. God is much more pleased by the spontaneous mercy of the Samaritan than by the dehumanized legalism of the Pharisees.

In our present age of political violence, of social dissatisfaction produced not only by specific ideologies, but also by hunger, sickness, and sin the evangelical church cannot continue allowing itself the luxury of setting aside buildings, of tying up huge sums of money for purposes not clearly sanctioned by the New Testament. In place of being so esthetic, it ought to be more ethical. Where there are church buildings, let them be better used, for the praise of God and for the welfare of needy mankind. The church in the fulfillment of its task ought to be quick and agile. Its activities and buildings ought not to raise barriers between it and the world. Activities and buildings should work together for open communication with persons outside of Christ, so that the greatest number may be saved, to God’s glory.

Commitment Not All Good

Much is being said and written about the need of commitment today. The need is critical because there is already so much commitment abroad that is not of the right kind. Ingmar Bergman, a Swedish movie producer, has said: "For me there is only one loyalty: to the film on which I am working. I may lie if it is a beautiful lie, prostitute my talent if it will further my cause, steal if there is not another way out. I could also kill my friends or anyone else if it would help my art.”

Here is commitment of a frightening intensity, but commitment it is! It reminds us of the commitment of a Hitler or a Mussolini or, still longer ago, of those who demanded Christ’s death. But it is just such an intense commitment devoted to the glory of God and exercised according to Christian principles that is needed today.—Gerald C. Studer.

Ignorance Is Not Bliss

What you don’t know will not hurt you, is an old saying; but is it really true? A person once passing through a public park saw nailed to one of the trees a sign: “All dogs found in this park will be shot.” A friend who was with him said, “Unless dogs can read they are pretty badly off here.” Many men today are worse off than a dog, for most dogs have a master to read for them.

There are few things more expensive than ignorance in action. Ignorance is more bold than wisdom, hence the slow progress of true development. You hardly ever can be as indignant after you have fully investigated. Not ignorance, but the ignorance of ignorance is the death of knowledge. It is harder to conceal ignorance than to acquire knowledge. The only thing more expensive than education is ignorance.

Ignorance is a sin as many Scriptures prove (Num. 15:27, 28; Lev. 4:2). Ignorance is the devil’s college.—Christian E. Charles

"Slogans and Shibboleths"

By Melvin Gingerich

A slogan was originally a war cry, or gathering word, of a Highland clan in Scotland, and hence it came to mean any rallying or war cry, as, for example, "Remember the Maine" was in the Spanish-American War. In the Mexican War it was "Remember the Alamo" and in World War I it was "Make the world safe for democracy."

Its meaning has now been extended to include "a brief, striking phrase adopted or invented for use in advertising a product, an institution, a community, or the like." It is obvious from this latter definition that slogans may be used for both social and antisocial ends. As illustrations of the two, one needs to recall only "join the unhooked generation" and the opposite type "I'd rather fight than switch."

The word "shibboleth" had its origins in Bible times as shown in Judges 12. It was a word that helped the Gileadites distinguish their own kind, for the Ephraimites could not pronounce the sh. Hence the word has come to mean the criterion, test, or watchword of something. It may be a party cry or a word or saying distinguishing the adherents of a party or a sect.

Much Overused

It is hardly necessary to argue that slogans and shibboleths are greatly overused. Long ago Sir Walter Scott wrote "Knaves and fools invent catchwords and shibboleths to keep them (honest people) from coming to a just understanding." More recently Russell W. Davenport wrote in his significant book The Dignity of Man. "The history of our time, in short, is a history of phrases, which rise to great power and then as suddenly pass away: the 'merchants of death,' the 'malefactors of great wealth,' 'monopoly,' 'reactionaries,' 'liberals,' the 'labor power,' 'America first,' 'cash and carry,' 'unconditional surrender,' 'peace in our time,' 'collective security,' 'bring the boys home,' 'disarmament,' 'the Red menace,' 'the atomic potential,' etc. At the time of their currency, few men have had either the courage or the resources to stand up against these tremendous shibboleths. They develop unpredictable authority. Men are destroyed by them, and others are raised to power, and others are rallied to a fighting cause, and wars are declared, and peoples driven from their homes. And after all this havoc has been wreaked, suddenly the phrase disappears and is powerful no more — indeed, is lost and forgotten and replaced by something else, very likely its exact opposite. Nobody seems to understand how and why phrases live and grow in this way, but it is a terrifying thing. And it is terrifying, not just because the phrases result in so much blood and suffering, but because they raise an awful question. They raise the question of truth. Where, in all this, is truth? Or is there any such thing at all?" Davenport goes on to say that nobody has all of the facts and yet opinions "give birth to symbols that rule the actions of whole areas of the earth. The separation of word and deed has had the peculiar result, that words, in the form of popular phrases, have taken on a strange, demonic life of their own, against which reason can not in the least prevail."

Good or Evil Forces?

All of this leads to fear, fear of Russia, fear of America, fear of the West by the East and of the East by the West. Men know that opinions phrased in shibboleths may grow and for a time become invincibly powerful. Will they be good forces or evil forces? Man does not know and so he lives in fear that something or some shibboleth may light not the torch of progress but the light of the "irreversible explosion of the hydrogen bomb."

In the 1970s many slogans and shibboleths are being used. One finds it difficult to select a most representative one for the purpose of illustration. Let me suggest one, however, that usually produces an emotional response among college students. It is the phrase "the system," sometimes referred to as "the establishment" or again as "the structure." To use these intelligently one must clearly define his terms. They evidently refer to the locus of power and authority in the community, the school, or the nation. Who is finally responsible for implementing decisions arrived at in the community?

Society may be disorganized, following the patterns of anarchy, or it may formulate structures that give at least a semblance of order to its community life. But eventually there will be a "system." If one system is overthrown, a new system or establishment takes its place. When God created men as social beings, the necessity of organization came with it. That is what the Bible means when it says that the powers that be are ordained of God.

Man, however, lives in a "fallen state" as Leonard

Melvin Gingerich, Goshen, Ind., was for many years professor at Goshen College and is managing editor of The Mennonite Encyclopedia. This is a convocation message at Goshen College, July 29, 1970.
Verduin points out in his book published July 1, under the title Somewhat Less Than God: The Biblical View of Man. As a result man is tempted to misuse power and to exploit people. He tends to debase his institutions, including even the institutional church.

The Christian Understanding

The result is that the dedicated Christian is always in tension with the institutional forms of the establishment. The Apostle Paul understood this when he wrote in Ephesians 6:12, "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." However, he understands that he is not only in tension with the principalities and powers but that he is struggling against similar evils within himself. It is not purely a struggle of "us" against "them." Our problems are too complicated to allow such easy approaches.

The Christian must therefore be very humble as he witnesses against the evils around him. Persons in power do need gadflies which keep stinging their consciences. But he will not be guilty of blaming all evil on certain leaders, political parties, or nations. He will recognize that to use the shibboleth approach is to oversimplify and to resort to emotional approaches rather than to reasoned dialogue. He will always recognize that when one party in power is voted out, the winners, idealistic as they may have been, will fall heir to the temptations which power brings.

The testimony of the late Kermit Eby is much to the point here. In the early days of the Congress for Industrial Organization, Mr. Eby was one of its influential idealists. He often told us of the drive of their early organization, and how it was motivated by a missionary zeal for reform. In time, however, the CIO became another establishment, with a set of self-seeking goals. Mr. Eby became disillusioned, withdrew from the organization, and wrote the book The Confessions of an Ex-Organization Man.

Must this response of withdrawal and of noncooperation be the only Christian response to "establishments"? There indeed come times when the "system" is so corrupt that one must withdraw completely from voluntary cooperation with it. There may be times when one cooperates with part of its program but not with other parts. It must be remembered, however, that when the New Testament taught subjection to law and to the "higher powers," perfect governments were not being described nor were distinctions being made between democratic and monarchial and even dictatorial governments.

Must the System Be Destroyed?

Another widespread ideology that has taken the form of a shibboleth must be challenged at this point. It is the concept that "establishments" are always incapable of self-analysis and reform. One must destroy the "system," they would have us believe, before any reforms can be instituted. That may possibly have been true at some places in history but to raise this statement into a slogan is to do what Walter Scott warned us against, that is to invent catchwords and shibboleths to keep honest people from coming to a just understanding of the issues.

It is easy for some persons to accept the Marxian shibboleths. Men are evil because their structures are evil, they insist. Destroy the old structure and liquidate its advocates and then the new society, the Utopia, will come to the surface, its proponents argue. The new society will produce the "New Man"; the old structures degrade man is the argument. They maintain that the present structures are incapable of self-analysis and of reform and, therefore, will destroy themselves.

At least two mistaken notions are present in this argument. The one is that a new and better society will almost automatically arise out of the ashes of the old. The second mistaken concept is that persons operating within the system are incapable of changing it.

To answer these charges one must have a long overview of history and be able to trace the development of responsible government and social legislation through many centuries. In order to appreciate where we are we must be able to see from where we have come. In this story we find the slow fruition of ideals that have had their stimulus in the Hebraic-Christian tradition and have been nurtured particularly in countries such as England and its colonies.

To be sure there is much in the story that could cause one to become bitter, cynical, and pessimistic. But on the positive side are the growth of education, the development of hospitals and nursing care, new attitudes toward leprosy and the mentally sick, prison reform, the temperance movement, the abolition of slavery, the improvement in the status of women, the ending of child labor, laws against false advertising, the control of lending agencies, the passing of pure food laws, the acceptance of taxes that bring about distributive justice, the freedoms guaranteed by the bill of rights. These changes happened within the system, without the violent overthrow of the establishments.

Problem Is Not New

These were won because there were prophets who dared suggest changes and who eventually succeeded in appealing to the consciences of enough persons so that the majority were convinced that changes were needed.

Barbara Ward, the distinguished English economist, in her recent book, The Lopsided World, shows how changes can be brought about within the establishment. It can be done, she says, and we should take courage. She writes, "Some two hundred years ago, the outlook was fully as daunting for a small group of devoted men and women who set out in England to abolish the greatest evil of their day—the trans-Atlantic traffic in slaves which was growing, decade by decade, as the large-scale cultivation of sugar and then cotton in the Americas sucked in more and more manpower from a demoralized Africa. The abolitionists faced some of the largest vested interests and most entrenched commercial ventures of their day. Influential cities like Bristol and Liverpool believed that not only their prosperity but their survival depended upon the slave trade. So did their..."

merchants and mariners and shipwrights. Indeed, a good case could be made for the argument that Britain's whole ability to operate its vast seaborn network of commerce between the Caribbean, North America, Europe, and the East Indies turned upon its access to gold and slaves along the tragic coasts of the Benin Bight. This was the formidable battery of national self-interest and economic advantage the abolitionists set themselves to overcome.

"Their methods could be a model to any groups — Christian, liberal, humane, radical — who believe today that grinding but remediable poverty is the contemporary form of slavery endured by a large part of the human race. They drew upon Christian reserves of conviction and dedication. Quakers, Methodists, Evangelicals were in the van. But they cooperated with all men of whatever persuasion — or no persuasion — who were ready to pursue the same ends. They organized meetings. They published fact sheets and pamphlets. They harassed members of parliament and created a strong parliamentary lobby with the totally disinterested and heartily revered William Wilberforce as its leader. They took advantage of the new, more liberal theories of commerce with which Adam Smith scattered the mercantilists and argued that the country could prosper without the horrors of the Middle Passage. Working in season and out of season, without any slackening of their pressure on people and leaders alike, they at last convinced their country that the price of slavery was too high for any Christian community to tolerate and secured — in 1811 — an end to the traffic and, some two decades, later, the freeing of all the slaves."

Barbara Ward is one of those courageous international Christians who challenges the easy platitudes of the establishments, who pricks the consciences of world leaders, but who has not surrendered to the spirit of cynicism or defeatism. She believes that the consciences of the people in the rich nations can be challenged to fight "the world's present slaveries of ignorance and sickness and hunger" and that they can dedicate themselves to the welfare of those millions who now hover between despair and hope.

Abortion: The Burden of Proof

By Lewis B. Smedes

With New York in the lead, the trend across the country is toward liberalized abortion laws. If the trend continues, the new laws are likely to embody the recommendations made almost a decade ago by the American Law Institute. This group of lawyers recommended that three grounds for abortion be permitted: the preservation of the mental and physical health of the mother, the conception of a child through rape or incest, and the prognosis of deformation in the child. The question is whether we will stop there. The Civil Liberties Union wants to get the law out of abortion altogether, leaving every woman free to decide for herself whether she shall carry a fetus to term. What should the Christian community say? Ought anyone to decide for herself whether she should keep or destroy a fetus?

As everyone knows, the entire question hinges on the status of the fetus. Is a fetus at any particular time a thing? Or is it from conception a person? If a fetus is a thing, the question of abortion and the law is a simple matter of whether to allow a woman to dispose of unwanted flesh. But no one is sure whether a fetus is a person or a thing at a given day on the calendar. And here is the rub. Who has the burden of proof, the pro-abortion or the anti-abortion people?

At some point in the muddled debate about abortion the burden of proof has gotten misplaced. In their gibes at theologians who used to think they could pinpoint the time when a fetus was invested with a soul, and thus became a human being, pro-abortionists seemed to suggest that our ignorance — or imprecision — about when a fetus becomes a person lent support to their position. It is as though one must now be able to prove that a fetus is a human being, at least in the (vaguely defined) earlier stages of pregnancy. A potential human being, it would seem, is not an actual human being. And therefore, it is morally and therefore, of course, legally permissible to abort the existence of the fetus-thing.

But, of course, being a potential human being is not unique to a fetus. What about a newborn infant? What about a boy walking frightened to his first day at kindergarten? What about a young lady taking her college diploma? What about a brand new PhD? Are these all fully actualized human beings? Potential humanity is the best any of us can claim. And where is the line to be drawn? Does a fetus, at some miraculous moment, spring from sheer potentiality to potential-actual humanity?

We cannot say. We do not know. But we do know that
The High Price of TV

By Joseph Bayly

As we enter the 70s, psychologists have become our conscience in areas of human behavior. Warnings about the effects of TV-watching are coming from psychiatrists and educators—not from pastors.

The church has apparently defaulted on its responsibility in favor of the psychologists. Whatever threat pastors see in television is not related to its effect on the human mind and behavior, but the effect on Sunday evening church attendance and pastoral home visitation.

Dr. S. I. Hayakawa, the embattled president of San Francisco State University, points out that by the time a typical American boy or girl has reached the age of 18, he has had 12,000 to 15,000 hours of TV-viewing. These are not hours stolen from school, but from relating to other people, parents, siblings, neighbors, the elderly, strangers.

He concludes that it’s small wonder so many students drop out; they did not learn how to get along with other human beings during their formative years.

Dr. Graham Blaine, chief psychiatrist in the student health service of Harvard University, has said that the most serious problem of TV is not poor programming, but that it has destroyed the average family’s exchange of views and information at the evening meal. People are anxious to get to a favorite program, he says, and so they hurry to finish eating. What happened during the day, the little things, and bigger matters are never discussed.

When was the last time you heard a preacher, or Sunday school teacher, warn about the family-fragmenting effects of television?

Is the church even remotely concerned about what this electronic communications medium is doing, may eventually do, to the human behavior of Christians? I think not. What I hear, when I hear anything, is the soul-destroying effect of the theater in theater, not the theater in the living room. Movies seem to have a baptism of purification when they are shown on TV.

The daughter of a friend’s pastor put it this way: “I can hardly wait till that movie is shown on television, so I can see it.”

What will be the long-range effects of TV on the American mind and morals, on the Christian mind and morals?

For perspective on the question, one psychologist says that the average child today, who follows the typical American viewing pattern, will by age 65 have spent nine years of 24-hour days sitting in front of a TV set. (If he went to Sunday school every Sunday during those years, he will have spent about four months studying God’s Word.)

Even if TV were morally neutral, it would have serious effects on Christian life and thought. You don’t spend nine years of life watching anything without being affected by it. Or even six or seven years.

Psychiatrists today place great stress on preschool years as formative in terms of a child’s character and attitudes. By the time a child enters kindergarten, many psychiatrists say, basic lifelong outlooks are crystallized. What is a matrix that forms children in America today if—as we are told by capable experts—the average child between the ages of two and five spends a quarter to a half of his waking hours in front of a TV set?

“It’s so cute the way our little boy can sing all the commercials.” I’ve heard that statement several times; so have you. But even if it’s cute, is it worthwhile? Is such mental conditioning, perhaps, in the long view dangerous?

Do Christian people even think of what Dean Martin, Tiny and Vicki Tim, Johnny Carson do to them and their children? Is this the sort of guest we want to invite into our living rooms every week?

What about family Bible reading? Prayer? If these are missing and Dean Martin, or Rowan and Martin are welcomed, aren’t we shouting something to our children and ourselves, something about the real values of life now and hereafter? No Sunday school, or later a Christian college, can replace that value system.

But TV is not morally neutral. It was a secular writer in the Detroit News (Kathy Sudomier, a 26-year-old newspaperwoman), not a preacher, who screamed loudly enough about TV advertising—“You dirty old ad men make me sick”—to awaken Advertising Age to a potential threat.

Has the church yielded its role of moral guidance, along with other roles, to secular society in our time?

After giving examples of sexually arousing pictures and dialogue in TV advertising, Mrs. Sudomier concludes: “If you think this generation represents the New Morality, then look out for the next one, Granddad. You’ll have our kids turned into the most oversexed, oversated monsters since the fall of the Roman Empire.”

A medical doctor in West Germany warned several years ago that the country that once knew the tyranny of Hitler now faces the tyranny of evil. And the United States, which has never—except in localized situations—known totalitarianism, seems to be embracing tyranny of evil.

In my opinion, this represents an interesting switch on George Orwell’s 1984. It is not Big Brother observing human life in every room by TV cameras who thereby controls life; Big Brother performs on TV in every room and thereby determines life.

If our Lord Christ returns during the 70s, will He find faith in the United States?

Circumstances

Circumstances are those things that stand around us. We cannot avoid them for they are part of life. They are shifting. They do not make a person, they only show what he is. They are the rulers of the weak, but the instruments of the wise. They are the material out of which we weave the garment of life. It depends upon oneself whether it shall be a garment of honor or dishonor.

It is a conquest when we can lift ourselves above the annoyance of circumstances over which we have no control. But it is a greater victory when we can make those circumstances our helpers, when we can appreciate the good there is in them.

Teach me, O Lord, so to use all the circumstances of my life today that they may bring forth the fruits of holiness. Let me use disappointments as material for patience. Let me use success as material for thankfulness. Let me use suspense as material for perseverance. Let me use danger as material for courage. Let me use reproach as material for long-suffering. Let me use praise as material for humility. Let me use pleasure as material for self-control. Let me use pain as material for endurance.

I AM DOING A NEW THING

- Jesus
Making reference to the July 4 "Honor America" day in Washington, D.C., UPI columnist Louis Cassels advised it might be a better idea to pray for the nation.

"There are two reasons why 'Pray for America Day' might be more appropriate than 'Honor America Day,"' he wrote.

"First, to pray for one's country is a more humble and God-fearing thing than to extol its virtues, however many and real they are.

"Second... prayer is an activity in which people can join regardless of how deeply divided they are about America's current policies at home and abroad."

The syndicated column concluded: "How about it, Billy Graham? Isn't a nation on its knees an even more impressive spectacle than a nation waving flags?"

More than 20 years after the communist takeover, the majority of Hungarians still prefer religious ceremonies on the occasion of baptisms, marriages, and burials.

Though the constitution provides for the separation of church and state, the avowed aim of the Communist Party is the establishment of an atheistic society.

In accord with this aim, there has been a steady campaign by authorities to substitute secular ceremonies for the religious rites that normally mark the major events in a person's life.

Nevertheless, a Hungarian journal, Magyar Hirlap, complains that the majority of baptisms and burials are still conducted according to the religious rites of the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Eastern Orthodox Churches, despite the communist regime's long propaganda campaign to substitute civil ceremonies for them.

Karl A. Olsson writing in The Church Advocate on "The Booze Culture" says: The air traveler who does not drink is being made into a second-class citizen by several domestic airlines serving meals in flight. It doesn't matter when the dinner is scheduled; before the nondrinkers are served, all the jovial lads and lassies must have their thirst quenchers. Stewardesses are first of all barmad, whipping out Bloody Marys, On the Rocks, and Martinis to the dry throats en route. Only after the chorus of satisfied abs and gurgling mingles with the drone of the plane are the blue-noses attended to. Since they are obviously a gloomy lot and have not fished out a buck for the booze, they are made to feel 'square' and rejected.

A Protestant clergyman-author warned that a lack of family togetherness and communication is at the heart of America's drug problem.

He said the only cure for this growing problem is "to raise a generation of kids who don't need drugs to get turned on," adding that this can only be accomplished by families that play together and pray together.

Charles W. Shedd, a columnist on sex and dating for Teen Magazine and author of several books on youth, said during a speaking tour of schools and churches that he was appalled by "how many young people on drugs come out of homes where there is little communication — first between parents and then between parents and children."

He deemed fathers the biggest offenders because they most frequently neglect their children. It is the father who is going to reflect God for the children, he said.

Mr. Shedd, pastor of the Presbyterian Community Church at Jekyll Island, Ga., explained that in his own family he arranges a once-a-month date with each of his five children for dinner, and then do "whatever the child wants to do." He continued:

"In my interviews with kids who told why they are not on drugs, the reasons invariably go back to such things as closeness of family, time together as a family, and responsibility — they were taught and allowed to take responsibility."

The clergyman also believes in daily devotions in the home, adding that "this is where you can do drug prevention because a child gets the feeling that life is beautiful and doesn't need artificial means to get turned on."

He asserted that one of the greatest failings of churches today is their neglect in building family devotional life.

"There has been too much emphasis in the past on the church on the corner as substitute for the church in the home," he said. The church in the home is the real church, the church on the corner is incidental."

Crime in the United States, as measured by the Crime Index, rose 11 percent during the first six months of 1970 over the same period in 1969. The violent crimes as a group increased 10 percent, with robbery up 16 percent, forcible rape 4 percent, aggravated assault 5 percent, and murder 9 percent. The voluminous property crimes, which make up 87 percent of the Crime Index offenses, rose 12 percent as a group. Individually, larceny $50 and over increased 15 percent, auto theft 8 percent, and burglary 11 percent. The large cities having 250,000 or more inhabitants experienced crime increases averaging 6 percent. In this large city group, violent crimes increased 9 percent and property crimes 6 percent. Crime in the suburban area was up 16 percent and the rural areas witness a 10 percent rise. Serious crime rose 14 percent in the North Central states, 15 percent in the Southern states, 12 percent in the Western states, and 6 percent in the Northeastern states. Armed robbery during the first six months of 1970 increased 19 percent over the same period in 1969. Assaults with the use of firearms rose 8 percent during the first six months of 1970.

Between the Lines reports new attitudes emerging among our seven million college and university students need to be understood — because the viewpoints churning up now will carry over until next fall and beyond. The failure to understand dissenting youth, even the tiny minority of wild anarchists (dynamiters and arsonists), is our greatest loss. There would be no real grounds for alarm in terms of our national security if politics weren't involved. First, there aren't many of them. The white anarchists total no more than a few hundred in scattered "cell" groups of four to six. The Black Panthers are more numerous but more readily identifiable. And neither whites nor black are united. They are at war among themselves, hence, no network of conspiracy exists.

Their depredations would easily be curbed by requiring permits or licenses for the sale of all explosives. As the military analyst Charles Howe points out, ordinary gunpowder used to reload shotgun shells, etc., plus several chemical additives, can be purchased without a permit or identification in many states as a result of the lobbying of the National Rifle Association. Dynamite can also be bought almost as easily or stolen from construction sites.

The National Rifle Association and manufacturers of explosives, through their powerful lobbies in Washington who operate in conjunction with the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Penta- gon, will seek to bar all legislation that curbs the sales of these products, thus putting all emphasis on the punitive rather than the preventive. The sources of explosive and incendiary materials used by the anarchist youth could be shut off and the movements checked quickly and mercifully. But a vengeful spirit, reeking with politics and hypocrisy, has contributed much to the creation of such delinquency.
Plan for Church Reorganization Approved—with Modification

A historical Mennonite meeting, held at Yellow Creek Mennonite Church, Goshen, Ind., might well be called a “happening.” It was such because not only was a new form of church organization approved, but a new depth of discussion and relationship was experienced. One longtime church leader called the meeting the best churchwide meeting he ever experienced. There was a keen consciousness expressed by many that the Holy Spirit brought bursts of illumination. At one point, after full and free discussion of differences, there evolved such a unity that the conference broke out to an exclamation “Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow.”

Attendance at the meeting, called by the Study Commission on Church Organization, was beyond expectation showing the strong interest and concern in the study prepared over the past five years. Attendance was excellent also from conferences which are not now members of Mennonite General Conference.

The meeting was characterized by openness, sharing, and frankness. Issues were quickly put before the body in discussion periods. The new concept of intermediate levels of organization between congregation and the churchwide assembly called forth major discussion. This concept of clusters and geographic regions was newly added to the plan submitted to the Mennonite General Conference in August of 1969.

This concept of regions is introduced as a way to keep the congregation central in representation and decision and reducing the General Assembly for the formerly proposed 1,400 delegates to approximately 350. The General Assembly will now meet every two years instead of the previously suggested yearly meeting. Between the General Assembly Meetings regional meetings are proposed.

The number of regions and their boundaries shall remain flexible pending further consultation and discussion with the conferences involved, with a recommendation to be brought to the 1971 Constitutional Assembly for consideration.

A modification statement given out at Yellow Creek following major discussion says further:

“It is understood that the development of regional organization is the prerogative of the conferences within the region and that the style and shape of this organization shall be worked out there. The Regional Assembly pattern is recommended, but the General Assembly and General Board shall recognize alternate patterns of representation to the General Assembly and shall also accommodate themselves to a schedule of development that represents the wishes of the region.

“The General Assembly may fill regional vacancies on the General Board and program boards if there are no means (regional assemblies or otherwise) to provide such representation.

“Membership from the congregation to the regional assembly shall be constituted by each congregation sending two delegates for the first 150 members plus an additional delegate for each additional 150 members or fraction thereof.”

Each churchwide board and General Conference took action independently to accept the report of the Study Commission on Church Organization as revised and modified in the Oct. 20-22 meeting plenary session and gave approval to the plan and pattern for a reorganization of the Mennonite Church and its agencies, including its implications in each Board or agency. A similar statement on implementation was adopted, authorizing the Study Commission to proceed with the next steps as outlined. This was followed by a joint meeting of all giving the same approval.

Flexibility was the word stressed in the implementation of the new model. There was also the call for constant review of the church’s organizational structure with the suggestion that the General Board arrange for a broad review of the total plan within five years.

Concern was expressed and discussion held over the financing of the new plan. The cost factors involved will depend upon what the church demands by way of staff and program and by what the church is willing to support.

A strong emphasis throughout the study of the new organization and heard throughout the Yellow Creek meeting was the need to keep the congregation central. The work of the church should be handled as close to the congregation as possible. Good organization should handle issues as close as possible to the locus of the issue itself and yet within reach of a sufficiently large context of brotherhood. This means to keep basic decision-making and action where it should be and in keeping with the historic Mennonite position and as opposed to extreme congregationalism.

The structure is designed with the desire that it be flexible enough so that the Holy Spirit can break in at any time and place and at any time structure may be changed when decisions need to be more readily implemented.

Plans for the future call for a Constitutional Convention to be held, along with the first General Assembly at Kitchener, Ont., Aug. 16-19, 1971. At this time also, the present Board and General Conference will conduct their final business sessions.

Shenks New VS Center Hosts

Amos and Mabel Shenk, Newport News, Va., began a one-year term of Voluntary Service on Oct. 12 as houseparents of the VS Center on the grounds of Mennonite Board of Missions’ headquarters in Elkhart, Ind.

The Shenks replace Dan D. and Clara Miller of Arcadia, Fla., who served for a three-month interim period at the Center until longer-term personnel were found. While living in Elkhart, Miller also chaired the building committee responsible to coordinate the addition and remodeling program at Belmont Mennonite Church.

Amos and Mabel Shenk are responsible to plan and prepare meals for VS orientation school participants, do housekeeping, and will assist with headquarters maintenance between orientations as schedules permit.

Before entering service, Shenk was a salesman for a farm-industrial equipment business. company in Newport News, and Mrs. Shenk was a bookkeeper for a building contractor. The couple has one son, William, living in Newport News.

The Shenks are members of Huntington Avenue Mennonite Church in Newport News.

34 Attend October Orientation

Another large Voluntary Service orientation school was held Oct. 12-22 at Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., with 34 persons in attendance. The volunteers and their assignments follow.

First row: Robert Bixler, Louisville, Ohio, and William Stuckey, Grabill, Ind., for two years at Immanuel Medical Center, Omaha, Neb.; Richard Delagrange, Grabill, Ind., ordination at Maple Lawn Homes, Eureka, Ill., for two years; Edward Becker, Cairo, Neb., two years as maintenance worker at Hattie Larrham Foundation, Mantua, Ohio; James Landis, East Green- ville, Pa., one year as orderly at Kansas City (Mo.) General Hospital; Robert Lovett, Medway, Ohio, business office worker at St. Anthony's Hospital, St. Petersburg, Fla., for two years; Merle Hostetler, Coatesville, Pa., two years as maintenance worker and recreation leader at Adriel School, West Liberty, Ohio; and Paul J. Zook, Belleview, Pa., two years as community service worker in Northwest Portland, Ore.

Second row: Ruth Kanagy, Stuarts Draft, Va., kitchen assistant for one year at Hattie Larrham Foundation, Mantua, Ohio; Janet Klopfenstein, Leo, Ind., one year as houseparent at Frontier Boys Village, Colorado Springs, Colo.; Diann Hostetler, Colon, Mich., ward clerk at St. Anthony's Hospital, St. Petersburg, Fla., for one year; Cecilia Coon, Wauseon, Ohio, secretary for one year at St. Anthony's Hospital, St. Petersburg; Linda Alderfer, Harleysville, Pa., one year as secretary at Mt. Sinai Hospital, Cleveland, Ohio; Jane Kaufman, Archbold, Ohio, secretary at Frontier Boys Village, Colorado Springs, for one year; Larry Stutzman, Pleasant Dale, Neb., two years as child care worker at Frontier Boys Village; Gladys Weaver, Harleysville, Pa., nurse aide at Virginia Home, Richmond, Va., for one year; and Larry Augsburger, Elida, Ohio, social worker and counselor for two years at Mennonite Hospital, La Junta, Colo.

Third row: Marc and Grace Miller, Val- rico, Fla., community service workers for two years in Alice, Tex.; Edward and Linda Meyers, Fountainville, Pa., community service workers in Nyses, Ore., for two years; Amos and Mabel Shenk, Newport News, Va., houseparents at the VS Center, Elkhart, Ind., for one year; Linda and Steve Steury, Berne, Ind., two years as program directors with the Stockton, Calif., unit; Connie and Don Garber, Harbor Springs, Mich., community service workers for two years in St. Louis, Mo.; and Stan King, West Liberty, Ohio, two years as orderly at Queen Avenue Manor, London.

Fourth row: Paul Hartman, Syracuse, Ind., orderly for two years at Harper Hospital, Detroit, Mich.; Sam Teague, Fargo, N.D., employment at Hesston (Kan.) College (not entering VS); Bernice Mullet, Millersburg, Ohio, nurse aide at Virginia Home, Richmond, for one year; Beverly Harms, Ulysses, Kan., one year as nurse aide at Harper Hospital, Detroit; David Schlegel, Shickley, Neb., orderly at Queen Avenue Manor, London, for two years; and Lynford Myers, Somerset, Mich., inhalation therapist at Presbyterian Hospital, Albuquerque, N.M., for two years.

Approximately 20 persons are expected to attend the Nov. 9-19 orientation. Currently 333 youth through senior adults are stationed in 56 different Voluntary Service locations in the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Puerto Rico under the auspices of Mennonite Board of Missions.

Founder's Day Held

None of the five original faculty members remain at EMC, but Chester K. Leh- man, who arrived on the faculty in 1921, continues to teach part time at Eastern Mennonite Seminary. He served as dean of the college from 1924 to 1956.

The early faculty members often found themselves placed in a surprising variety of roles—not too much specialization in those days, said Bro. Lehman. He edited the first EMC Journal, which later evolved into the Weather Vane and the Shenandoah, the student newspaper and yearbook. Among other things he sang in an active faculty quartet, shared in founding the YPCA, and choosing the motto—"Thy Word Is Truth."

"I always enjoyed noticing how many of our graduates are called into special Chris- tian service at home and abroad," remarked Lehman as he begins his 50th year of serv- ice at EMC.

John R. Mumaw presented the main Founder's Day address, "My Spiritual Pil- grimage in a Decade of Beginnings." He first attended EMS in 1920 and seven years later joined the faculty as an instructor. He served as president of the college from 1945-65. Mumaw told how EMS helped to change him from a rebellious teenager into a servant of the church.

"There was certainly a lot of exciting living packed into those early years," he remarked. Mumaw said that students were asked them: "Who am I? How do we make Christianity relevant? How can we achieve the indwelling and power of the Holy Spirit? What is our position on war?"

"Student concerns today continue to center around these questions," remarked Mumaw.

President of the college since 1965, Myron S. Augsburger quoted an early founder, "Here shall arise a temple of learning which will widely bless the church and hold the gospel ground against the world."

Augsburger continued, "These objectives for EMC have remained in focus through the years; these objectives expressed in forms contemporary with our times, do express our purpose. Education with a Christian world view places the emphasis on the lordship of Jesus Christ in the forefront and motivates the faculty and students to serve by being Christian in our vocations.

Broadcast Draws Listener Feedback

In the Aug. 16 Mennonite Hour sermon, "Condemned Out of Our Own Mouths," David Augsburger detailed U.S. demands on war crimes following World War II and showed how these actions have prejudged its present acts of war in Vietnam.

Only on one other occasion has a Mennonite Hour sermon evoked such a varied listener response — angry, shocking, commanding, appreciative, critical, far right, far left, inquisitive.

"God was not a pacifist. . . . I hope and pray you see the light before it's too late. . . . I'm so thankful we don't have a namby-pamby God." — Buffalo, N.Y.

"The discourse was to the point all truth. Only intense nationalism (not patriotism), and we have too much of that, could deny these truths." — Allentown, Pa.

"In approximately one year our son will be facing the 'draft lottery'. . . . We find differing views concerning a young man's relationship to military service. . . . Send us materials which would be helpful for ourselves and our son." — Perkins, Pa.

"Does Augsburger think war is like a Sunday school picnic? I think I shall not listen to Mr. Augsburger anymore. I am sure I can find patriotic Christian ministers who stand up for America." — Phoenix, Ariz.

"It was the strongest anti-Vietnam war statement I have heard over the air. And it desperately needed to be heard with Billy Graham putting his stamp of approval on the war and then denying that he has done it." — Newton, Kan.

Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., welcomes additional audience response. Copies of Augsburger's Aug. 16 address (no. 144) are available by writing The Mennonite Hour, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801.

News-Forum to Continue Student Communication

A news-forum publication on behalf of Mennonite university and college students will appear in November. The planned monthly is intended to more fully meet the ideal of a forum which had been anticipated but only partially realized in the former experimental student publication, Arena. John Rempel, editor of Arena during its two-year existence, will initially act as editor of the news-forum. News-forum sponsors are the Student Service committees of the General Conference Mennonite and the Mennonite churches.

Format and publication schedule of the new publication, which will appear monthly throughout the academic year, has been changed to better facilitate feedback and discussion. Response to current articles will be possible up to one week before publication of the consecutive monthly issue.

Students in the Mennonite Church will have a chance to indicate whether they wish to receive the publication. The forum will provide for conversation among Mennonite students (and faculty members) on campuses and among groups and individuals on campus and interested members of the brotherhood in other settings. The news-forum will be a medium of communication for brothers in the various settings of the church.

As an experimental venture Arena was open to change and revision. The Student Service committees (General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, and Mennonite Church) acted to discontinue the publication in the spring of 1970. The All-American Award, highest-standing award of the Associated Collegiate Press, was granted Arena in late spring 1970.

Several factors presaged the committees' decision to halt Arena's publication. The unavailability of an editor to replace Rempel partly put the paper's continuation in question. Misunderstanding and inadequate communication of the aims and benefits of dialogue hindered Arena's full acceptance. Dialogue was also hampered by the extended time period — a minimum of two months — between which an article appeared and in which responses could be printed.

Neither editor nor sponsors agree that every idea expressed, yet they were willing to provide an avenue for discussion, though which it was hoped would emerge greater understanding and appreciation for fellow students and fellow church members. Almost all of the content reflected concern for the church, the church's mission in the world, and the church's relevancy and witness.

With the demise of Arena the forum for saying the things which needed to be said wanted a publication. The news-forum will attempt to carry on from where Arena left off.

Missionaries Respond to Somalia's Self-Help Program

The government in Somalia is promoting self-help projects for the development of the nation. One evidence of the seriousness with which top government officials are promoting this goal was the President's recent announcement of salary cuts for civil servants to enable increasing both the staff and the budget for the Ministry of Agriculture.

"I believe that we need to become much more creative about 'getting with the stream of things' than we have in the past," reported Harold Reed, Secretary of the Mennonite Mission. "Our efforts in the direction of community development, agriculture, technical training, etc., must be given priority."

In order to make schools for adults available across the country, the President is pressing teachers to volunteer their services in after-school hours. Nine teachers from the Mennonite schools are presently serving in this way. Mr. Hussein from New Africa Bookellers teaches one hour each day as the bookstore's contribution to the program. Harold Reed hopes to arrange for some of the missionaries to do some additional teaching.

Self-help projects are also moving ahead at the community level. At the request of the District Affairs Officer, John Zook has prepared plans and cost estimates for a slaughterhouse at Johar. At Mahaddei, the community self-help committee assessed Somalia Mennonite Mission So. 3,000, the equivalent of a month's wages for fifteen laborers, to help raise funds for a new elementary school. The missionaries do not see a way to make a cash contribution, but hope to suggest some concrete way in which they can symbolize their support for the aspirations and efforts of the community.

Donald and Esther Lauver, representing the Lancaster Conference Missions Council, made helpful pastoral visits to the missionaries at Mogadiscio, Johar, and Mahaddei from Sept. 6-9. Local believers shared in Bible study and testimony meetings.

A class of fifteen, the first class of the proposed secondary school, is studying at Johar. Due to inflation of costs, some additional funds are being sought to enable the beginning of the building program.

Speaks on Mideast Crisis

Mr. Joseph Abileah, prominent Jewish pacifist and resident of Israel for more than 40 years, recently spoke to the seminary community on the topic, "My Vision for Peace in the Middle East."

Although he is an accomplished musician, Abileah has laid this vocation aside in favor of promoting the cause of peace between Jews and Arabs, particularly since the June 1967 war. He has presented his peace plans to the Israeli government, has met personally with King Hussein of Jordan, and is currently trying to shape both Jewish and Arab public opinion toward the acceptance of a peaceful, nonviolent settlement.
He came into contact with Mennonites in 1968 and was impressed by their "biblical pacifism."

In 1947, Abileah was one of the few Jews who opposed the partition of Palestine. Instead, he favored an economic confederation of states there — a principle he is still working for. In the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, he spent some time in prison for his nonviolent stand.

Abileah has worked with Arabs on the West Bank and has made specific proposals that would alleviate the refugee problem. Although some of these proposals have gone to UN peace-keeping committees, Abileah feels that neither the UN nor the great powers can bring about a lasting peace in the Middle East. He believes that peace will come only when Jews and Arabs can stretch out their hands toward each other in brotherhood and accept the principles of nonviolence and mutual respect as the basis for a lasting peace. "We must not be short of what is required in the Sermon on the Mount," he said.

VS Conferences Scheduled

Approximately 70 persons in leadership capacities at Voluntary Service units sponsored by Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., are expected to participate in two In-Service Training Programs to be held during November and December.

Kidron (Ohio) Mennonite Church will host approximately 35 leadership personnel from units east of the Mississippi River (including Chicago and Puerto Rico), Nov. 2-6, while Hesston (Kan.) Mennonite Church will welcome a similar number of persons from Western-based units Nov. 30 to Dec. 4. Representatives from five VS units sponsored by Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa., will also attend the Kidron gathering.

Kenneth Seitz, Jr., director of in-service training and convener for both upcoming sessions, sees the primary thrust of both conferences as assisting leaders of VS units in understanding themselves and their tasks in developing an environment of Christian communal living for service and witness.

Resource persons and Voluntary Service Office staff personnel will provide basic input on understanding self and others. At Kidron, Marion Bontrager, minister with youth of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite district conference, will provide insight into youth and their culture. Dorsa and Mary Mishler, a husband-wife team from Elkhart, will direct role-play sessions focusing on group relationships. Mishler is personnel secretary at Mennonite Board of Missions, and Mrs. Mishler serves on the staff of Oaklawn Psychiatric Center.

In addition, Beulah Kauffman, executive secretary of WMSA, will stress building strong human relationships through facing God, self and others. Lynford Hershey, recently appointed director of Minority Ministries Education at Mennonite Board of Missions, is to speak on "understanding racism and prejudice." Worship periods and Bible study groups are to be led by VS administrator Leonard Garber, while Bill Detweiler, pastor of Kidron Mennonite Church, will emphasize "leadership and the spiritual dynamic."

Also at Kidron, special arrangements have been made for VS teams to present midweek programs in local congregations.

The Nov. 30 to Dec. 4 conference at Hesston is expected to follow much the same format and emphasis with input largely provided by resource persons from Hesston College and community.

The Relief and Service Division of Mennonite Board of Missions sponsors In-Service Training Programs annually to provide additional orientation for in-service VS personnel carrying unit leadership responsibilities.

Home Ministries Council Approves Guidelines

A new resource for Mennonite and Brethren in Christ mission and service workers was created with the formation of the Home Ministries Council; a representative committee of mission and service administrators gave final approval to the Council’s organizational guidelines in their third meeting held at Chicago, Ill., on Oct. 7 and 8. According to the guidelines, the Council will now meet biannually.

The Home Ministries Council is a domestic counterpart to the Council of Mission Board Secretaries (COMBS). COMBS has dealt primarily with overseas mission concerns. The Home Ministries Council seeks "to provide a channel for communication, consultation, and coordination among Boards involved in mission and service programs [in North America], with opportunity for reporting and sharing. . . ." The Council coordinates planning of joint projects and special studies between the member agencies.

Chester Wenger of Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions served as the Home Ministries Council’s first chairman for a two-year term. At their recent meeting, the Council elected a new chairman; Paul Leatherman of the Mennonite Central Committee was chosen for a two-year term. J. Wilmer Heisey of the Brethren in Christ Mission Board has already served one year of a two-year term as HMC Vice-Chairman. Simon G. Gingerich of the Mennonite Board of Missions was reappointed for one year as HMC Secretary-Treasurer.

The Home Ministries Council heard progress reports in their recent meeting on various Council projects. Ray Horst presented a Mission-Service Projects List — a compilation of all Mennonite home missions and voluntary service projects sponsored by the member organizations. There are over 400 projects reported in North America.

Using information supplied by all HMC members, Palmer Becker and Malcolm Weng- er are making a study of problems of the American Indian and how these influence mission work with the Indians. Becker presented a progress report

The group also heard progress reports on the training of workers for urban mission, on racial sensitivity education efforts, and on a study of voluntary service. Becker presented a planning report on the proposed 1972 Mennonite Consultations on Evangelism and reported on possible Mennonite involvement in Key ’73 — a nationwide evangelistic effort in 1973 in which as many as 100 Protestant denominations will participate. A report was given on the new draft laws and what possible implications they may have for the service programs of HMC members.

Asian Work Campers Search for Identity

Thirty Asian Brethren in Christ and Mennonite young men and women recently gave 300 man days of labor to convert a former rice paddy into an athletic field at Faith Love Children’s Hostel in New Territories, Hong Kong. The occasion was the sixth annual Asia Reconciliation Work Camp held Aug. 8-23, 1970, and sponsored by the Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section.

Faith Love Children’s Hostel is sponsored by the Christian Children’s Fund to make it possible for orphaned or needy children to attend school. An athletic field for the school was a must. All that was required was strong will, muscles, and sweat to complete the project. The 30 young people provided these necessary ingredients.

Hearing of the efforts of the work campers, a lady from a Nazarene Christian Primary School came ten miles across New Territories to ask for help. Her school was in desperate need of a basketball, volleyball, and tennis court. The work campers went and dug, picked, leveled, and poured concrete for the project. By the end of the two weeks, both projects were nearly completed. Shouts of “Si-Si” (many thanks) rang in the ears of the work campers as they left the two places which had brought the group together as one as they had worked, joked, prayed, played,
Anabaptist Disputation at Frankenthal

A service commemorating the four hundredth anniversary of the Frankenthal disputation with the Anabaptists from May 28 to June 19, 1571, will take place May 23. 24, 1971, in Frankenthal, Germany. For this purpose the "Vorberendte Ausscass Frankenthal 1571 bis 1971" has been established through the interests of the Palatinate Landeskirche and the Palatinate-Hesse Mennonite churches. The chairman is the former Palatinate Church President, Prof. D. Theo Schaller. Prof. Dr. Martin Schmidt (Heidelberg), one of the initiators of the celebration program, characterizes the Anabaptist disputation of 1571 as "a great hour of tolerance and genuine understanding on a grand scale of heterodox Christians not recognized by the state, as well as a significant broadening of the Peace of Augsburg."

FIELD NOTES

Thirteenth Annual Bible Doctrine Meeting at Columbia (Pa.) Mennonite Church, Nov. 15. J. Frank Zeager, Middletown, Pa., and Aden K. Diller, Greencastle, Pa., instructors.

Adriel Turnbull, Crawfordsville, Ind., and a former Holy Land missionary will be at Rocky Ridge Mennonite Church, Quakertown, Pa., for meetings, Nov. 14-16.

Adriel School is looking for a teacher with a BS or a BA in education to work with students who have social and learning problems. Immediate opening. Apply: Adriel School, Box 188, West Liberty, Ohio 43357, or call 513 465-5010. Don Hertzler, Administrator.

David Hostetter, former missionary to Brazil at Pleasant View, North Lawrence, Ohio, Nov. 7, 8, 9. Bro. and Mrs. Warner Jackson, Cleveland, Ohio, at Pleasant View, North Lawrence, Ohio, Nov. 15. Joe J. Swartz, Topeka, Ind., at Vincent, Spring City, Pa., Nov. 2-8. Paul M. Miller, Goshen, Ind., at Roanoke, Ill., Dec. 11, 12.
Howard J. Zehr, Scottdale, Pa., at Springdale, Waynesboro, Va., Nov. 8-11.

Mrs. Lois Clemens will be the speaker at the Fall Inspirational Meeting of Ontario WMSA at Rockway, Kitchener, Ont., on Nov. 10.

The 50th Anniversary Service for all women's groups will be held at Blooming Glen (Pa.) Mennonite Church on Nov. 14, Sat., 9:30 a.m. to 3:15 p.m. Guests of honor will be all women 70 years of age or older.

First Mennonite Church of St. Peters- burg, Fla., reports a Stewardship Conference held Oct. 16-18, with Michael Shenk of Sarasota as speaker. Michael led the group's thinking along lines of stewardship in money, time, praise, and service. The closing meeting was climaxed in a communion service.

Friends of Mrs. Lenora Dietzel Sempira will be concerned to learn of her brain surgery while on a visit to this country from Uganda. She is faced with several months of convalescence and with staggering hospitalization costs. Friends who wish to give assistance may make contributions to the "Service Fund" of the College Mennonite Church, Goshen, Ind.

William Shumaker was ordained as pastor of the Benton Mennonite Church, Goshen, Ind., on Aug. 30. Vernon Bontrager was in charge of service and Ed Stoltzfus preached the sermon.

New members by baptism: thirteen at Benton, Goshen, Ind.; five at Rocky Ridge, Quakertown, Pa.; twelve at Hartville, Ohio; three at Forks, Middlebury, Ind.; one on confession of faith at Steelton, Pa.

Brook Lane Psychiatric Center: Position in kitchen as cook's helper. Must be filled soon. Phone collect. Starting wage $1.65 per hour. Can live in women's residence on grounds.

Charles Shenk, Kushiro, Japan, reports: "Mimoto-san (pastor at Tottori) has asked me again to convey a thankful greeting for the Board's involvement with us in the new church building project here in Tottori. The building is very well done and is serving our activity program in a fine way."

B. Charles Hostetter writes from Lagos, Nigeria: "I have been preaching in the Church of the Lord congregations and have more invitations. I really am challenged by the teaching assignment and its opportunity. It is a great open door to teach the Word of God without strings or restrictions to the leadership of this church. From all I can tell a deep friendship is forming and good confidence has been established. Praise God!"

Addona Nissley, Coamo, Puerto Rico, writes: "This is a bit of news about the rains in Puerto Rico. Some 20 to 30 inches of rain fell on the mountainous island. Reports vary, but here are some statistics: 10,000 people homeless; $50,000,000 damages estimated; 50 persons either drowned or missing; agriculture has received a staggering blow. Many roads are impassable, either flooded or blocked by landslides; six major bridges washed out and five more seriously damaged; utilities suffered much and the people even more. Local agencies are responding in a wonderful way to the needs, and it is gratifying to see how differences are pushed aside when an urgent need presents itself. We are in contact with MDS and probably will have a group of men come to the island to rebuild where most needed."

Change of address: Mr. and Mrs. Robert Otto, 117 rue General Gratry, Brussels, Belgium.

Carl Opel was ordained to the ministry at Masonstown Mennonite Church, Mason- town, Pa., Oct. 25. He served the congregation as licensed pastor the past year. His address is R. 1, Box 681A, McClellandtown, Pa. 15458. John M. Drescher officiated at the service.

The estate of David S. Jantz, Kitchener, Ont., has bequeathed the sum of $1,617.17 to Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart.
The Mennonite Mission Board of Ontario received an equal amount.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

This is in response to Celia Lehman's contribution to the "As I See It" column in the Oct. 6 issue. I appreciate this opportunity for dialogue and believe that the author raises an important issue.

With one of her central statements, however, I must disagree. I don't believe it is a biblical position. This is the statement that "cessation of importance" in God's plan is "Man, Woman, Animals, Things." I would contend that all of us, women included, are equal before God. In His perfect plan for the kingdom, God has not assigned second-class citizenship to half the human race.

Last summer at Mission '70, I was privileged to hear Lois Clemens, Lansdale, Pa., give briefly some results of her in-depth biblical and historical study on women in the church. If I understood her, and I think I did, she found full equality of men and women, when the totality of incidents and teachings is considered.

TV and comic strips do sometimes depict Aunt Jemima and woman as domineering, but for every show of this type there is another, often a western or detective story, which shows men as aggressive, gunslinging, don't-push-me-around heroes. The movement for equal rights for women is not limited to our country, and in my view, has not been brought on by a lack of masculinity on the part of men.

The fact is that women's roles, along with a great many other things in this century, are changing. For example, with the pressure on to reduce population growth or suffer worldwide famine, women are being occupied for fewer years of their lives with the care of children, though they may still find this extremely enjoyable and fulfilling. This is only one kind of change we are seeing.

As Christian men and women, we may often realize our differences and bring varying gifts to the service of Christ. We would certainly deplore some of the tactics used by women's liberation groups and find these actions to have no place in the mind of better ministers. But we should recognize that the changes all around push us out of comfortable roles and we have to search for God's will in relating to each other. Thank God, we are one! The walls have been broken down and we all stand equal and loved before Him. — Doris Longaere, Akron, Pa.

In the article, "What the Well-Dressed Woman Isn't Wearying" (Sept. 8), Kerry Ellio attempts to deal with the problem of immodesty and lust. However, he not only fails to deal with the cause but his underlying assumptions condone and reinforce perverted attitudes toward nudity, the body, and women as objects of lust. I believe the article and the solutions he offers are integral parts of the problem.

The description of women as "luscious bait," "mouth-watering themselves," the comparison of them to "the aroma of steak and apple pie and coffee," and the reference to ugly bodies that need to cover up for nothing more than your contact with them. The Women's Task Force campaign supports the deplorable attitude that women are objects defined primarily in physical terms.

Kerry Ellio has accepted the belief that nudity and sexuality are necessarily equated. He refers to the unclad state as displaying "your sexual credentials." This, in my opinion, is a very limited definition of human sexuality. Hopefully, sexuality includes more than physical characteristics.

Nudity becomes an issue only when a person's attractiveness or worth is defined in terms of this physicality. In terms of their "physical attributes" and women have graciously conceded to make themselves "appealing" in these respects. In other words, most people (and women) have agreed to be objects of lust. As long as this sinful way of relating to each other exists, lustful thoughts will persist regardless of the amount of clothing on a person's body.

When the beam is removed from its place of prominence in relationships between people, modesty becomes a question of attitude, not dress code. Men and women alike will continue to rate human beings as objects of lust and women will rid themselves of these sinful attitudes. Let's get away from Elliot's "cover up girls" hand-aid solutions and get to the heart of the problem.

— Yvonne Couraud, Sarasota, Fla.

I appreciate your attempt to communicate to all of us in the Gospel Herald. I would not be honest if I said I read the Gospel Herald from cover to cover, or that I agree with every article that is printed. But then I guess making decisions is part of the fun of living.

Your editorial of Sept. 29, "All Resisters and Mountain Men," is not acceptable, with 100 percent with your emphasis. The only problem is that I began to be haunted by the thought that the "against it" attitude may be the one that has contributed in large part to the fact that many won't hear of my ministry. It just could be that much of my thinking is "against" rather than "for." If you intended your editorial to bring comfort to some of us who don't consider ourselves resisters, you failed. Thanks anyway.

— Chester Slagel, Weatherford, Okla.

Something has been bothering me as I read the "Birtlo" column in Gospel Herald from week to week. One continually reads of couples who have brought their fourth, fifth, sixth, or even eighth or ninth child into the world. In John 10:15, "A Litany for the Earth, Man, and God," I read the quotation:

"The essential cause of environmental pollution is overpopulation, combined with an excessive population growth rate."

If Christians take their responsibilities to fellow human beings and to the earth seriously, how can they go on producing large families in defiance of such information?

I continue to provide advice to others, but I no longer believe in or pressure others to produce large families.

THE FREE CHURCH AND SEDUCTIVE CULTURE
by Calvin Redekop
Illustrated by Ivan Moon

The author presents areas in which the church has been and is being seduced or led astray while claiming divine perception. He says the only hope the church has for recovery and integrity is the institution of a "structure for accountability" which is already evolving in the secular world but is rejected by Christians as being too costly. He uses historical data and sociological case studies to support his thesis.

This book is for churchmen as well as sociologists and anthropologists. Contains Preface, Introduction, Table of Contents, Footnotes, Illustrations, and Epilogue.

The Gospel Herald was established in 1908 as a successor to Gospel Witness (1905) and Herald of Truth (1864). The Gospel Herald is a religious periodical published weekly by the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pa., except the first or second Tuesday in July and the Tuesday following Thanksgiving Day. Subscription price (in U.S. dollars): $5.00 per year, three years for $14.85. For Every Home Plan: $4.75 per year mailed to individual addresses. Gospel Herald will be sent by air mail upon request to overseas addresses. Write to Customer Service for current rates. Change of address should be requested six weeks in advance. Send all materials for publication to Gospel Herald, Scottdale, Pa. 15683. Lithographed in United States.
Forks or Shovels?

Once an incompetent craftsman was found beating away at something in his shop. "What are you making?" he was asked. "Well," he replied, "I was hoping to make a fork but it seems now it may turn out to be a shovel."

Sometimes in congregational life we are not that lucky. If we set out not knowing what we are about the product is likely to be rather useless. Even if our forks turn out to be shovels they will hardly be good ones.

We must know what we can do and have some sense of how it can be accomplished. We must seek the Lord's leading and not merely stumble along on our own. A congregation must have what could be called a philosophy of congregational life. That simply means a way of working. In a sense all congregations, whether they have developed a formal philosophy or not, have a philosophy anyway. But if we are not consciously functioning from some sort of strategy we will certainly have an incoherent program. It would be like sailing with an erratic compass, or worse, paying no attention to the compass at all.

Would you agree that a philosophy of congregational life is important? This special issue of the Gospel Herald is an attempt to say a little about a philosophy of congregational life. You need not agree with this philosophy yet it might generate some discussion in your congregation which can help your church to develop a philosophy to fit your situation.

A philosophy of congregational life is necessary so Christian education can function effectively in a context that is understood. Do you think the following philosophy provides a helpful context for Christian education?

Arnold Cressman
Mennonite Commission for Christian Education of Mennonite General Conference

The following is the attempt of the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education of your Mennonite General Conference to give you a very brief philosophy of congregational life. It begins with the people of your church and moves toward the purpose or mission to which God is calling you, a purpose uniquely yours because of the kind of gifts of people God has given to your church, and because of the opportunities for mission He has given you.

You will see immediately that a philosophy such as this says a great deal about the kind of equipping, or Christian education, (nurture) that is needed. The MCCE has a staff of persons available to help your congregation in developing more fully a viable Christian education program.

The following paragraphs are set up in a modified program learning style. Move on to the next numbered paragraph only after you are sure you understand what you have already read.

1. People

are God's gifts to the church. Without people He would have no church. As His gifts all, that means each person, are important in the life of your congregation. People for whom Christ died, people who have decided to follow Him, are very important if His kingdom is to succeed.
People who are becoming God’s people have many needs, areas in which they can be helped to be more fully what God intends. Through Christian education the church seeks to help all persons to know God as revealed supremely in Jesus Christ and the Scriptures: to become aware of who they are, of what their situation is, and of their alienation to the end that they may repent of their sin, respond to God’s redeeming love in faith, and become members of the body of Christ; to grow in Christ within the community of believers, to walk in the Spirit in every relationship, to fulfill the call to discipleship in the world, and to abide in the Christian hope.

Congregation Central

One of the primary considerations at the recent meeting on church organization at Yellow Creek Mennonite Church, Goshen, Indiana, was the centrality of the congregation. Although the Mennonite Church historically believed that it is in the local congregation where church must happen first, during the past several decades decision-making and mission thrust was considered more at other levels. It is good to see the emphasis again being placed on the congregation. In the congregation is the place also where Christian education must go on. Here is where persons must become aware of who they are and what their task is. The congregation must be the setting where homes are strengthened, where the Scripture is taught with power and persuasion, and where the mission of the church is carried out. When the scriptural teaching of starting at Jerusalem is really practiced, Judea, Samaria, and the uttermost part of the earth will also be reached. — D.

Need is not limited to the brotherhood; in fact it is the world which has the greatest need. God sent His Son into the world because of the world’s need. Every congregation of God’s people is an oasis in a wasteland of need. Like Christ, the church exists to serve the need of the world. Your congregation is closer to the needs of some of the world than any other servants of God.
When people as God's gifts to the church are matched with the needs of the world, the first step toward a relevant congregational program is taken. The program is uniquely theirs because a people saw a need and acted. Program begins with the gifts of people. (Example: The Good Samaritan gave himself and what he had to meet the need of the man who fell among thieves.)

There are many continuing things happening regularly in your congregation. There is worship, preaching, discussion, nurture, reconciling, discerning, and sanctioning. None of these dare become habit. All of them are a part of what the congregation is — a corporate disciple of Jesus Christ.

The corporate personality of your congregation, like a fingerprint, is different from any other congregation. It is different because God’s gifts of persons are different. They see different needs in themselves and in the world where they live. The program they develop in matching people with needs is different than their neighbors'.
After a congregation has determined its program, both the new things and the ongoing things it will do, both the things it will do for itself and what it will do for others, it is ready to consider the adequacy of available facilities to do the job that needs doing and how much it will cost to do it.

People (God’s gifts) matched with needs (the congregation’s opportunity) determine the program a local church must fulfill to be faithful. Facilities and finances follow program. That is a helpful motto for all budget planners and building committees.

It is easy to run around the diamond the wrong way. As in baseball, that does not score. Yet many congregations start at third base. They say, (3) “What could we do with a budget of so much?” (2) “How much program would that make?” (1) “What needs can we meet?” Then people become the pawns of program. They are used to fill the slots in an already determined program. They are cogs in the machinery of productivity.
When people are considered cogs (when they are important mostly because they are needed to keep the program running) they lose heart. They are merely pieces of the congregational machine instead of "living stones" (1 Pet. 2:5) in a vibrant church which God is building. Persons "used" to keep the wheels of congregational machinery turning are not free to be all that God intends for them as His gifts to the church.

On the other hand, think of the vitality and freshness in the program of a congregation that takes the infinite variety of the gifts of its people seriously. Each person can stand tall among his brothers because he is free to be the gift which God has made him. What he can do well is fully as much a part of the congregation's total program as the part contributed by the five-talented man.

It is not hard to see that everything in the congregation has a third dimension. There is a purpose in what God is asking your church to be and do. That purpose is the same thing as your congregation's mission in the world. Your congregation's mission is as unique as its people.
God had something in mind when He gave that certain combination of gifts of people to your congregation. He had something in mind when He placed the people of your congregation strategically so that in the process of living and working they would touch the lives of certain people in the world. The people of your church, individually and corporately, are called to be good Samaritans to some whom everyone else is passing by. Wouldn't it be a shame if your congregation were looking the other way? Wouldn't it be unfaithful? It is as important for a whole congregation to find God's purpose as for the individual.

A congregation is tempted as often to do too much as too little. It cannot do everything that could be done. So it is important to determine what should be the priorities for this year. What short steps, or goals, can move the congregation forward in mission in the world?

Somehow the whole congregation must be involved in determining where it is going. Both the short steps (the goals) and the long steps (the congregation's purpose or mission) must be determined together. All of the people must have ownership in the decisions that are made about where the congregation is going. It should be clear to all and accepted by all that this is in fact the direction that God is leading.
The church becomes most truly the church when it finds a way to discern the will of God for it specifically and regularly. The church worships most deeply when it senses that God as the pillar of the cloud and fire moves ahead of it. There is much that the congregation must discern as it moves. The gifts of leadership are active in the process of discernment. And the Holy Spirit makes discernment possible.

But what does a congregation discern? What should it discern? This is where the congregation has the opportunity to become alive! It is exciting to discern what gifts of people God has given, what needs can be met in the world, what the shape of the program should be, what facilities and money are needed to do the job God wants done, and which steps can be taken this year and next.

Perhaps the one committee that is needed above all others is a committee to lead the congregation in the experiences heart of congregational life would help the congregation keep so that among all that could be done the congregation would do a few things well.
A major area for discernment is how persons can be equipped to do the best possible job of mission in the world. This is the task of Christian education. Once it is clear what a congregation’s purpose and goals are, then Christian education can be put to work undergirding all efforts. A host of settings can be used to prepare people for mission in the world.

What kind of equipping do they need? It depends partly on the job that is to be done. Yet some things are basic. 1) A thorough knowledge of the Bible is necessary. This educational task begins with small children and continues through life. 2) A clear understanding through experience of what commitment to Christ means is most important. 3) The issues which are raised when we walk as disciples of Christ in the world must receive the counsel of our brethren as we search the Word of God together.

The equipping process is equally as important as mission. They belong together for without mission equipping is an exercise in futility. And without the equipping process the mission cannot be carried out. That could just be why Jesus emphasized both teaching and mission in the same commission. “Go, then, to all peoples everywhere and make them my disciples: baptize them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teach them to obey everything I have commanded you. And remember! I will be with you always, to the end of the age.” (Mt. 28:19, 20, TEV).
It was he who "gave gifts to men"; he appointed some to be apostles, others to be prophets, others to be evangelists, others to be pastors and teachers. He did this to prepare all God's people for the work of Christian service, to build up the body of Christ. And so we shall all come together to that oneness in our faith and in our knowledge of the Son of God; we shall become mature men, reaching to the very height of Christ's full stature. Then we shall no longer be children, carried by the waves, and blown about by every shifting wind of the teaching of deceitful men, who lead others to error by the tricks they invent. Instead, by speaking the truth in a spirit of love, we must grow up in every way to Christ, who is the head. Under his control all the different parts of the body fit together, and the whole body is held together by every joint with which it is provided. So when each separate part works as it should, the whole body grows and builds itself up through love (Eph. 4:11-16).
WHAT CAN BE DONE NOW?

Some congregations find it helpful to work at discernment on various levels. The congregational business meeting is one possibility, yet it is difficult to spend enough time or to really meet as brethren on the things that are most basic. Discerning the gifts of people and the needs that can be met by the congregation demands a more extended setting. This can be a home, a church basement or a camp setting. Here in a long weekend, preferably from Friday evening to Sunday noon, groups can get a great deal of discerning done. God can break through as the group prays, studies the Scripture, meets face to face, talks and worships. Such an ordinary thing as writing on a chalkboard what is being said and felt often focuses direction and provides the opportunity to move toward a consensus which is clearly the leading of the Lord.

After the leadership group has worked hard at the task of discerning, after it has come to a consensus taking into account all that the brethren in the congregation have been saying to them, then a way must be found to get the entire congregation involved in the emerging decisions. This is the tenuous balance between good leadership and total ownership of the final product by the group responsible to act.

Most important of course is for the whole congregation to be fully aware that the way they are moving is what God wants for them.

God's Spirit in the Argentine Chaco

What spirit is it that lures a young man with his family away from a promising work — which he has largely been responsible for starting among his own Mocovi people — into the big city where his spare time is taken up with church visitation among poverty-stricken white people? During the one return visit that he has since made to his own people, he obviously didn’t want to tell us all that had happened to him in Buenos Aires. Rather, he talked glowingly of how many churches he had visited, how he was welcomed, and how people marveled that an Indian from the Chaco could preach so well.

A recent letter from him declares his intention to visit the North again at the time of the annual conferences in Chaco and Formosa, this time accompanied by several white men who say they are interested in the work. We already know the type: footloose fellows, only too willing to wander from place to place, perpetual guests, never really accepting responsibility for anything they do, but always seemingly welcomed by the Indians. Fortunately, their unsettling influence is usually short-lived; seldom do any of them repeat such a visit.

We can’t help but ask if God’s Spirit is involved when some of the most gifted Indians abandon their own people to draft among the whites. Usually they claim to be evangelizing. But when their own people feel critical toward them it indicates that what is taking place would better be called social and personal disintegration, a chasing after the rainbow.

Faithful Service Continues

Fortunately, however, there are many Indian church leaders who quietly stay at their posts and faithfully lead their people in public worship and other activities which characterize an Indian congregation conscious of the Spirit’s leading. Numerous baptisms have taken place during the year, at least 100 of these occurring during Christmas and New Year’s meetings.

Young people are finding satisfaction in the church. Some churches have tremendous groups of young people who band together to form the singing group in their meetings. Guitars and drums have become standard equipment. Thus, those church leaders who encourage their young people to actively participate in these choral groups, to regularly attend the meetings, and to allow the Word of God to guide their lives are obviously building the Indian church of the future.

Albert Buckwalter has served as a missionary-pastor and Bible translator with the Mennonite Board of Missions in the Argentine Chaco since 1956. His article is another in a series related to the Mission ‘70 theme, “The Spirit of the Lord upon Me.”

Missionaries as Pastoral Counselors

Naturally we missionaries feel that our own responsibility is to strengthen the hands of such leaders who form the backbone of the work of the Spirit. Our key role is to serve as pastoral counselors to them. Throughout the year we have tried to regularly visit the circuit of congregations scattered throughout much of the Chaco and Formosa provinces. The missionary wives always give a Bible study lesson, while the missionary men preach and distribute printed Bible lessons for later study by the leaders.

Perhaps the personal visits and counseling with the church leaders is the most basic contribution to be made, even though we are also expected to provide some rudimentary medical supplies such as salves, ointments, and aspirin, as well as to carry Testaments, Bibles, and hymnals to sell to the people. As a supplement to these necessarily infrequent visits, pastoral letters were mailed out eight times during the year.

An acutely felt need for more Bible study for the people led the Michael Masts to conduct a series of such studies in several churches during the winter months. This was so much appreciated that a continuation is planned for this coming year as well.

Bible Translation

During the year the manuscript of the Book of Acts in Toba was finally finished and mailed to the American Bible Society where it is now in process of being printed. In the later stages of preparing this translation the Toba helper grew increasingly difficult to work with as his interests became incompatible with Bible translation. This writer’s one great chastening experience was his relationship with this man. Also this man’s relationship to his own people in the Toba church on the outskirts of Saenz Pena became severely strained.

Many concerned individuals reported to the missionaries the problems he was causing. Older men complained about being treated with disdain and classified as ignoramuses. Younger men said that they felt completely unneeded in the church. This man acted as though the church and its people were his sole property to handle and use to his own personal ends. How could I give objective help in a situation where I was personally so deeply involved with the man in question?

What seemed like an insoluble problem resolved itself at least for the present when he decided to move to a church in the outskirts of Resistencia, the capital city of the Chaco province.
By Albert Buckwalter

Very shortly afterward a very capable young Toba moved to Saenz Pena. Upon testing his ability at translating, he was found to be a genuine answer to prayer. Not only was he every bit as capable as the previous helper, but in addition he began to use the product of our work in his preaching, and even organized a class of young men which met three times a week to study.

At this time we have completed translations of 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and James, as well as numerous selected passages of Scripture which are useful for special occasions such as baptism, communion, child dedication, etc. In addition we have finished translating a survey of Old Testament history in narrative form which fills a total of 130 double-spaced pages. (The Book of Acts filled 116 such pages.)

A tentative edition of 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, mimeographed by the Masts in one small volume, has been in circulation for several months, while an equivalent edition of 1 and 2 Thessalonians and James is now ready for distribution.

It appears that general interest in reading Scripture in Toba is increasing, especially now that we have several Epistles available. Perhaps this interest is due to a recognized need among the people to deal with sub-Christian behavior among themselves.

The Michael Masts and the Albert Buckwalters expect to be joined soon by the Willis Horsts who have already finished language school and are awaiting their visa.

"Surprised by joy" — the joy of experiencing God at work amid the pain of judgment. This is Christ’s church in Japan now.

Many older prewar established churches are experiencing deep inner tension and confusion as youth and younger pastors have taken a severely critical stance against them.

"Judgment should have begun at the house of God," a leading pastor declared on August 15, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ending of World War II. "But instead of repentence and confession and sacrificial giving, the churches remained silent and were the first to enjoy an abundance of aid from overseas."

There is recognition that the struggle and suffering of this hour can be healing and redemptive, resulting in a decade of solid growth. But it depends on the response of the churches to God’s discipline.

The “younger churches,” mainly established since 1945, seem to have largely missed this traumatic struggle. However, they haven’t altogether escaped the current unrest. Neither has there been any “breakthrough” in church growth in spite of the multiplicity of plans and programs and the massive outlay of funds and personnel this past century. And we begin to discern the form of the Lord’s judgment.

After moving to the city of Asahigawa in mid-August this year, one of our first concerns was to assemble all the members of the Mennonite fellowship in order to plan strategy and program. All six active members were present for this first love-feast members’ meeting. But we never got around discussing any program details.

Instead, the Spirit led us to open our hearts to one another in honest confession. We found a self-portrait in Luke 5:1-11. We saw Jesus and our own sinfulness. We acknowledged our deep needs before Him. We heard afresh His words of amazing promise. We accepted them. And in the joy of this surprising experience we found the living Christ coming to us and making clear His plan for the growth of His little flock here.

Co-workers are sharing similar experiences with us. They are being surprised, too, to see the Holy Spirit working in many small events that are adding up to overflowing joy. The growth of Christ’s church will be multiplied, we know, if we really let Him be Lord of His church.

Whose Land Is Palestine? is, in the author's words, an attempt "to help overcome two weaknesses in the Western approach to the world in general and the Middle East in particular, a historical view that is too short and a theological stance that is too narrow."

To lengthen the view and broaden the stance, Epp presents a series of claims that have been laid to the "center of the earth," the land known as Palestine. Beginning with the claims of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Epp also presents the claims of Islam, of Christianity, of Zionism, of the British, of the Arabs, of the United Nations, of Israel, of the Palestinians, and the claims of God.

In the final chapter Epp suggests that Christians can now make a contribution to peace in the Middle East "only if they become willing to die and sacrifice on behalf of Israelis and Arabs. And this does mean going to war on their behalf on either side. It does mean entering the arena of war on both sides and sharing the insecurity that the conflict brings. We have in mind an unarmed peace force, consisting of well-trained, well-motivated, fearless, strong, and loving young men and women who would in one way or another absorb the insecurity, fear, and even the blows arising from the conflict."

Epp has had personal experience in peacemaking as he relates in an explanation of the dedication of the book to Fahed and David. "Fahed is a Palestinian, a refugee of the 1967 War. David is an Israeli soldier. The author met them in the summer of 1968. Fahed was a fellow passenger in a taxi from Amman to Jerusalem. He had received permission to return to his West Bank village for a few days to see his home and his relatives. He was hoping against hope that his return would be permanent. David was one of the guards at the newly established Israeli customs and checkpoint at the Allenby Bridge on the Jordan River. The customs process was a long one, and Fahed and I struck up a conversation with David. When it was time to go, I invited them to shake hands. They were reluctant at first, but finally they agreed. David put his gun aside, and they shook heartily, not once but twice, the second time being for a photograph. Both of them asked for prints which subsequently have been sent to them. Back on the dusty road, Fahed became uneasy about what he had done, feeling strongly that he had compromised the Arab position. Then he asked, 'What does it mean?' 'It means,' I said, 'that you are a gentleman, that's all.' He seemed relieved, and I added, 'It also means that you are brothers.' I wish you were right," Fahed replied. This book is dedicated to Brothers Fahed and David and to the proposition that Arabs and Jews are not only cousins, but, under God, brothers, and that they should and can live together in the same land."

Whose Land Is Palestine? is timely in view of recent peace developments in the Middle East. Published by William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, paperback copies can be obtained at local bookstores at $3.95.

Since most of us are Christian citizens of the most militarily involved and overextended nation in the world the tax problem should be of special concern to us who are members of the historic peace churches. But as American involvement in wars and military solutions grows and grows it is encouraging to note in Christian circles an awareness of the problem and a growing uneasiness on the propriety of paying taxes when they are used mainly for war and war-related purposes. However, there is a bewildering confusion of responses to that ethical problem.

The key question is then: Can the Scriptures provide us with the means of testing whether or not payment of such taxes constitutes a form of idolatry of a war god and as such be contrary to our commitment to a way of love? In this context the present study by Donald D. Kaufman's What Belongs to Caesar? is especially appropriate.

The 100-page presentation followed by 28 pages of Bible references, footnotes, and an index has all the marks of diligent and careful scholarship. Maybe you'd expect a book of this nature to be a crusading weapon charged with an emotional stance for a particular view of the Christian's relation to the state and on nonpayment of taxes, but it isn't. In his first chapter Don Kaufman carefully examines the history of taxation from ancient times till today. In chapter two he takes a new look at biblical passages often used to justify absolute, unquestioning obedience to governmental demands, and urges us to reexamine them in the context of their full chapter, or better yet, seen in the total context of the Bible. In this way the writer proves that, for instance, Romans 13:1 and following is not a passage in which every governmental action is given carte blanche. In no situation should a person be required to disobey his conscience by submitting to government. Without becoming a violent rebel the Christian can refuse to do what he regards as wrong, but he must patiently endure the consequences. To resist with respect is to render a service to the state by reminding it of its true function. In chapter three Kaufman squares the argument against the paying of war taxes under the Christian's obligation to obey God rather than man.

The records of Anabaptists, Mennonites, and Hutterites are examined in chapter four, as are the Quaker and Mennonite practices in Colonial America. This chapter ends with a variety of statements by recent and current church leaders on the issues of tax objection. In his concluding chapter Kaufman asks anew: "What Belongs to Caesar?" and why we who refuse our warm bodies to the war machine so willingly surrender our cold cash to the same. How long, Kaufman asks, will the Christian pray for peace and pay for war. The answer depends on you.

No one can give careful attention to this book without having the issues clarified. It is hoped that this book, developed jointly by the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church will be widely read, seriously discussed, and that out of it will come conduct that will consistently embody the gospel of love we profess. — Jan Gleysteen.

Lois Cheney, as a professor of speech, daily encounters students who need to question their surface attitudes toward religious convictions. They need a direct, personal communication with God. So she has written this book of "Ninety-nine Acts of Communication with God."

What can you say when every meditation stops you in your tracks? What do you do when God steps out of the stereotypes we have created? Just how have you been using God lately?

The words for each day's thinking will stab your ego. "These should not be read through quickly. ... They should be pulled into yourself, argued over, thought about, prayed about, elaborated upon, diminished, or discarded — all as part of your personal search for the God who loves, the God who is no fool."

This book is a rare find. It is a stretching-out, exposing book. If you can't stand that kind of encounter, it is not for you. Excellent for church libraries, even better as a personal possession for frequent use. — Sylvia Jantz.

Despite declines in church attendance, membership, and finances in major denominations, the church may be experiencing a "Great Awakening - 1970 style" a seminary professor said.

"Alongside the decline we see a vigorous resurgence of interest in religious things," said Dr. William M. Pinson, Jr., associate professor of Christian ethics at the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Fort Worth, Texas.

Though some of the religious interest is "kooky" and much of it is outside "traditional, historic Christian circles," he said, "there are churches outside the greater system - because they are in the churches in which the Spirit is whistling with gale force," he told a seminary chapel audience.

"The missionary journeys of Paul are not just to be memorized," he said. "They are to be practiced. Some churches are finding great joy in taking the gospel to shacks in the shadows of their steeples."

Dr. Pinson called upon those inside the "institutional camp" and those outside to stop throwing rocks at each other and "start helping each other."

While the church can offer such things as facilities, people, programs, and "rich experience in many areas of life," he said, "the nontraditionalists also have much to offer."

"They have had the courage to throw off the shackles of ways not working. They have set their sails wide to let the Spirit of God fill them and carry them along."

"For some of us within the church, this new direction may be frightening. But for those whose faith is in the power of God rather than programs, it is a joyful part of the Christian life."

In most civilized countries, criminals, idots, and hell-bent revolutionaries can't buy or steal dynamite and guns as if they were groceries. President Nixon recognized this in his recent call for severe restrictions on the sale and accessibility of explosives. But little will be done about restrictions, for to restrict explosives would likewise prompt action to curb the sale of guns, and any attempt to do that will bring hot political pressures from the Nat'l Rifle Assn. and its powerful allies - the Pentagon, the arms manufacturers, and veterans' organizations. So President Nixon didn't mention firearms.

Sen. Tydings of Maryland, heretofore quite secure politically, has been pushing legislation for gun control - the result, a drive by the NRA to defeat him in the coming election by fair means or foul.

The U.S. had 14,590 murders last year, many more per capita than nations with civilized gun laws. The FBI annual crime reports show that a fourth of these killings were within families and about half of the murders were among families and friends. Most of these would never have happened if a loaded gun hadn't been handy when drunkenness, anger, or both caused temporary madness.

Kent State University students were urged to pledge themselves to nonviolence at memorial services held for the four students who died last May in a volley of rifle fire by National Guardsmen.

The estimated 6,000 students who gathered for the service, however, were encouraged to continue their "resistance" to the war in Vietnam and racism and repression in the U.S.

The Rev. Ralph David Abernathy, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was one of the speakers. He called on students to fight "the forces of oppression and repression, the violent and murderous policy of America."

"Choirs and standing applause followed Mr. Abernathy's declaration that "it is the state, the government that is violent in America, and not the people who protest and dissent."

The number of church fires throughout the U.S. increased by 100 in 1969 to a total of 3,900, according to data compiled by the National Fire Protection Association (NAPA).

Loss of church property damaged or destroyed reached $19 million - an average of about $4,900 loss per fire. The 1969 figure, however, was more than $1 million less than the 1968 low.

Fires increased by 50 percent in hospitals, homes for the aged, and other service buildings, a field in which many churches are active. The number of fires jumped from 8,200 to 12,300 in this category last year. Financial losses rose from $11 to $13 million.

A total of $108 million in religious books were sold in 1969, according to data compiled by the Association of American Publishers, Inc.

Bibles, Testaments, hymnals, and prayer books accounted for $47 million of sales in 1969, with other religious books adding $61 million.

However, the dollar volume of religious book sales for the year dropped $2 million from the 1968 figure. This was due to a decline of $8 million in the Bibles, Testaments category - although there was a rise of $6 million in the sale of "other religious" volumes.

The United Methodist Family Life Conference was warned that if civilization is to survive, today's family must become a setting for dialogue between the generations.

When understood from a Christian perspective, the family does not exist "merely to perpetuate a wooden style of life nor to establish rules on morality," said Dr. James T. Laney, dean of the Candler School of Theology in Atlanta.

Rather, he said, we see ourselves linked to the oncoming generation in a dynamic interplay.

New York Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm also addressed the conference, speaking on "Bring Us Together - Parents and Children."

Dr. Alan Walker, newly installed president of the Methodist Church in New South Wales, declared that conscription and the Vietnam war were "the two great dividers" in Australia.

On his installation he called for repeal of the National Service Act and the withdrawal of Australian troops from Vietnam. He also urged the government to give young people a greater share in "decision-making."

Noting that youth is "more angry and alienated" than at any other time in history, Dr. Walker emphasized that Australia was "a dangerously divided society, threatened by an outbreak of violence."

That is why "responsible leadership" should be acting now "to halt the movement toward further civil strife which could lead to bloodshed," he said.

The Evangelist, weekly magazine of the Catholic Diocese of Albany, published the following as an editorial in a black-bordered box on page 1:

"Albany Medical Center Statistics (September):

- Abortions: 181.
- Live Births: 151.

"Albany now holds a record for rate of abortions over every country on the face of the earth."

"Japan's rate as a world leader is recorded at one abortion per live birth."
Panel Discusses the Draft

"Draft resistance, a relatively infrequent response to conscription in years past, has now become a widespread means of protest against the Selective Service System," said Conrad G. Brunk, vice-president of the National Inter-Religious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors (NISBCO) in a recent open forum on "Conscientious Objection: Option or Co-option" at Eastern Mennonite College.

Nathan Showalter, president of EMC's Student Government Association who chaired the forum, reported that discussion centered around changes in the Selective Service System forced by the increased number of draft resisters.

Curtis Tarr, Selective Service's new director, is intent on changing the image of his agency, according to Mr. Brunk. He said, "He feels, 'If you can't lick 'em, join 'em!'

Mr. Tarr is currently working on some sweeping changes in the system that could call for reconsideration of the Mennonite Church's attitude toward the draft, added Mr. Brunk.

The Selective Service System prefers conscientious objectors to draft resisters. As John W. Eby, assistant professor of sociology at EMC noted, "They're trying to popularize the CO position."

Mr. Brunk said, "Selective Service has been doing some thorough house-cleaning these days. They realize that they have to come up with a satisfactory program for the new breed of resisters to stem the flow of American men to other countries."

Panelist Gerald Shenk, editor of NISBCO's newsletter, The Reporter, reviewed the history of the Selective Service System and the position of the Mennonite Church.

"We've come a full circle since WW II and the Civilian Public Service (CPS) program," he said.

Selective Service is considering reviving a program similar to WW II's CPS that would be administered by the CO community. All COs would be eligible regardless of the grounds for their objection.

Paul Erb, visiting professor of biblical literature at EMC who helped formulate the church's position in WW II, spoke from the audience. "CPS was a modus operandi. The real intent was alternative service," he said.

Mr. Eby added, "Our compromise with Selective Service parallels our acculturation as a church into American society."

Mr. Showalter listed several approaches Selective Service might take. One approach would likely phase out I-W service as such and require something like Voluntary Service of all objectors.

Another option would create a National Service Program, required for men and women, that would allow the selective to choose between military service and various other service programs.

Although the forum did not solve the questions about whether the church has done the right thing in the past and what the church should do in light of the present situation, the panelists exposed an auditorium full of students and faculty to the complexity of the current situation.

The questions included: What attitude should traditional peace churches have toward the new nonreligious objector? What about resistance? On what grounds do we determine our response to conscription? What does the Bible say?

Offerings for Ministers

The annual Goshen Biblical Seminary School for Ministers and the General Conference Pastors' Seminar are being combined for the first time this year in an Inter-Mennonite School for Ministers which will be held Jan. 13-21, 1971, on the seminary campus. Several classes helpful to the pastor and Christian worker will be offered, including "Passages from the Prophecy of Ezekiel" taught by Millard Lind; "The Significance of the Believers' Church for the Local Congregation" by Edward Stoltzfus, Associate Professor of Bible, Goshen College; and "2 Timothy's Message for Pastors" by Erland Waltner. Additional features being planned include supervised small-group experience, lectures on preaching, counseling, the pastor's mental health, and the role of women in the church.

A Mass Communications Seminar, sponsored by the Mennonite Council on Mass Communications and the Associated Seminaries, will be held on campus Jan. 22-24, 1971. Program features under consideration include viewing and evaluating TV spots, films, and programs; discussion groups on various areas of the mass media and a service of worship growing out of the seminar with members leading and participating.

The keynote speaker will be Miss Pamela Iott, Director of Religious Programs on CBS television. There will be opportunities for discussion with some of the persons who are planning and producing Mennonite radio and TV programs and spots.

Cash for Blankets, Tents Needed in Jordan

Urban Peachev, Mennonite Central Committee director for Jordan, rode into Amman on Saturday, Oct. 3, with an airlift of 11 tons of food for relief to the victims of the recent fighting there. Peachev reported by telephone from Beirut on Oct. 7 that the need for airlifted emergency food is largely met. Items now being requested for a longer term are blankets, tents, family kits, and soap to meet needs as the cold and wet winter approaches in Jordan.

MCC made an initial contribution of $10,000 to speed the airlift of food into Amman where the fighting had done most damage. Now, sensing the strong concern and support of the constituent churches and seeing the great need in Jordan, MCC is attempting to determine what the further extent of its commitment will be.

United Nations Works and Relief Agency for Palestine refugees (UNWRA) needs 60,000 blankets, 5,000 tents at $100 apiece, an undetermined number of family kits at $10 each, and 200 tons of clothing to meet the refugee needs. The requirements of the Jordan government agencies for nonrefugee needs are not yet known.

Clothing in the MCC warehouse in Amman is being distributed in the Jebel Hussein and the Amman new refugee camps where the heaviest fighting took place and about 50 percent of the dwellings were destroyed. The warehouse was neither damaged nor looted.

The kindergartens operated by local staff closed down during the fighting and have not yet been reopened because teachers cannot travel from Amman to the refugee camps. The mother-child centers have reopened. "All phases of MCC programs which can be run by local staff will resume operation shortly," said Peachev.

Musselmans Spearhead Church Building Efforts

Two lots have been selected for a church building site in Jundiai, Brazil. Early in April 1970 Glenn and Lois Musselman went to Jundiai and began a witness in this growing industrial city located between Campinas and Sao Paulo. The witness, upon advisement of the Protestant Council of the city, was located to serve a four-cell area (wards within the city). The lots fulfill the city's requirements of a minimum of 500 square meters for a church lot and the building will face outside a residential area.

The site for construction of a worship and Christian service center is on the edge of Vila Liberdade and is a central location to the other vilas. It borders a government-owned plaza where many pedestrians pass by. The proposed church will face a main highway where other stores and commercial houses are located.

In a letter received on Oct. 15 at Mennonite Board of Missions, Musselman indicated: "We plan on initiating building in 1971. Mr. Azuma who works in a factory is free in the afternoons and promised to give contributed labor, as have many others . . . and of course I can serve as a serente to a bricklayer for two or three months. Our little group started a deposit account in a bank here and by March of next year we expect to have over 2,000 cruzetos ($425) for buying materials, bricks, etc.

"May God lead us all in these considerations is our prayer," Musselman added.

New Lectures Scheduled

The Conrad Grebel Lectureship Committee (sponsored by the Mennonite Board of Education) met in Chicago on Oct. 8, 1970. The Conrad Grebel Lectures given early this year by Lois Gunden Clemens are scheduled for publication by the Herald Press in March 1971 under the title Woman Liberated. There will be no lectures given in 1971 but three series of lectures are planned for 1972. Don Jacobs of Nairobi, Kenya, is preparing a series on "The Church in Africa." Harold Lehman of Harrisonburg, Va., plans to give a series on "The Christian and Leisure," and Albert J. Meyer of Goshen, Ind., on "The Mennonite Philosophy of Higher Education.

Schools, churches, or conferences wishing to schedule these lectures should get in touch with the Executive Secretary of the Committee, Carl Kreider, Goshen College, Goshen, Ind. The Conrad Grebel Lectureship Committee is prepared to pay the transportation expenses for the speaker to three different places where the lectures will be given.

The committee also agreed to place on sale the work of art (sculpture) prepared by Paul Friesen of Hesston College as his John F. Funk Lecture. The money realized from this sale will finance additional similar lectures. Schools, churches, or individuals wishing to purchase this work should submit their bid to Clayton Beyler, Hesston College, Hesston, Kan.

Congregations Become Classrooms for Seminarians

An innovative experiment in theological education is being forged this year at the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries. This is the Supervised Experience in Ministry (SEM) — a structured experience for second- and third-year students based on the premise that the traditional classroom lecture in practical theology courses is no longer adequate to fill the church's need for fully trained seminary graduates.

Emphasis is now being given to placing seminarians in actual ministering situations in congregations while being supervised by a faculty adviser, a committee of committed laymen in the congregation, and by their peers in the classroom. Students receive three hours of credit per semester and enroll for the Supervised Experience in Ministry courses along with their other courses.

Response from the congregations and students involved thus far has been favorable and in many cases enthusiastic. It is becoming clear that the stimuli for meaningful growth and learning in real-life situations can have far-reaching implications both for the student and the congregation with whom he serves.

Paul M. Miller, Chairman of the Work of the Church Department, is responsible for the basic structuring and implementation of the program. He is being assisted by Chester Raber, Director of Community Education at Oaklawn Psychiatric Center, and a team of faculty, including Erland Wiltner, Weyburn Gross, and Orlando Schmidt. Arnold Roth, pastor of the Kern Road Chapel, South Bend, Ind., is also helping in supervision, student counseling, and placement through a grant from the Parish Ministers Program of the Rockefeller Foundation.

The pilot project for the program was conducted last year when six students spent the whole academic year at four cooperating congregational centers within the Mennonite constituency. That new program was called the experience in "Congregationally Supervised Pastoral Education." These centers were the Faith Mennonite Church, Newton, Kan., the Valleyview Mennonite Church, London, Ont., the Akron (Pa.) Mennonite Church, and the Hesston (Kan.) Mennonite Church. Six students are participating in this program again this year.

Pastors and laymen in these churches worked together with the seminary to provide the students with practical experiences in preaching, counseling, Christian education, church ministries, and youth work. "Congregational committees for brotherly counsel" were organized and worked together with the student to determine under the guidance of the Holy Spirit what the gifts of the student were and to develop those gifts by "instant feedback" and frank brotherly admonition. Patterned after this initial experiment, the course in Supervised Experience in Ministry was added to the seminary's curriculum this year.

There are 19 second- and third-year students participating in the SEM courses on campus. Each specializes in the area of preaching, youth work, music, or counseling. Depending on the area of specialization, the student is placed in a local congregation and related to an appropriate day care center or other service agency.

A maximum of six students are allowed in each interest area so that the classroom experiences will remain in a small-group context where the experiences and problems of the individual can be given adequate attention. Each student also spends 12 hours per year in personal consultation with his adviser.

In preparation for the second and third years of practical work in SEM, the Work of the Church Department encourages each first-year student to take part in the experience of a second-year student by observing him in his assignments or by simply evaluating himself in the context of his own church participation.

There are also opportunities for participation in a wide range of other ministries including the local coffeehouse ministry or in the "generic helping process" at Oaklawn Psychiatric Center where students are given the opportunity to actively join in one of the group-therapy sessions.

Purchase Books from Theologian

Another quantity of books from the library of Professor Otto Piper, noted theologian and professor at Princeton Theological Seminary for many years, has been acquired by the library. This installment will bring the total number of books acquired from Dr. Piper to over 4,000.

The Associated Seminaries have been receiving books from the professor's library since 1962. Among them are some first-print texts from 19th-century German theologians and some that date back to the early 18th century. Other books on historical and theological themes have been acquired. Also included is a collection of New Testament texts in different languages.
Out-Spokin’ Sponsors Weekend Hike

Twenty-three riders, an equal number of 10-speed racing bikes, several additional staff persons, a Ford van, an equipment trailer, and a Suzuki motorcycle left Elkhart, Ind., the afternoon or evening of Oct. 23 for an Out-Spokin’ bicycle hike through Brown County, Ind. After being transported to Brown County State Park near Bloomington, the participants camped overnight prior to beginning their two-day scenic tour.

The cycling entourage, composed of Mennonite parents and their teenage sons or daughters from the Indiana-Michigan area, covered 40 miles on Saturday, Oct. 24, and camped overnight at Starve Hollow State Park. The hike concluded Sunday afternoon after traveling 40 additional miles west to Spring Mill State Park. Activities scheduled in addition to bicycling and camping included group singing and sharing and attending a Lutheran church en route.

Rhea Zimmerman, a secretary at Mennonite Board of Missions who accompanied the group as cook, said, “Talking and sharing together, singing around the fire, praying together and seeing the bikers’ determination to keep going was really great. Although I didn’t ride a bike, this weekend gave me the opportunity to observe the beauty of God’s creation and made me realize how little time I’ve spent just sitting quietly and listening.”

Director of the Out-Spokin’ program is Jerry Miller, who also schedules and directs Voluntary Service orientation schools at Mennonite Board of Missions. He noted that registration fees for Out-Spokin’ participants include insurance coverage and meals. Actual costs are based on mileage and length of given tours.

Out-Spokin’ is moving toward a policy of providing a number of shorter trips especially over weekends to allow for a greater number of participants (40 is the maximum for a given trip). Several long-distance tours, however, are also in the planning stage. A Florida excursion is presently being offered Dec. 28-Jan. 1 that will originate in the Sarasota area. Another long-distance trip is being tentatively scheduled for June 1971 from northern Michigan to Eureka, Ill., the destination being the site for Mission ’71, the annual meeting of Mennonite Board of Missions. Interested persons should write Jerry Miller, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514, for additional information.

The Out-Spokin’ program, which began in 1967, is sponsored by the Relief and Service Division of Mennonite Board of Missions. A board of directors formed in April 1969 controls the financing and program operations.

Sauder Honored for Service to Children’s Home

Erie Sauder, Archbold, Ohio, was honored at an Oct. 22 dinner meeting of the Board of Sunshine Children’s Home, Maumee, Ohio, for his almost ten years of service as Board chairman. Sunshine Home provides home care for mentally retarded children ranging in age from infancy to 20 years. Newly appointed Board chairman is Mr. Frank Ratta, a pharmacist in Maumee.

Board member Mr. Tom Day noted the changes and developments that have taken place at Sunshine during its 20-year history from its establishment by Mr. and Mrs. Roy Engler as a home on their own property to an expanding institution for the care of 94 retarded children. He also noted that years ago, Mrs. Sauder, as part of a WMSA group active in assisting Sunshine Home, told her husband to “stop by the Home sometime.”

During Sauder’s ten-year tenure as Board chairman a Voluntary Service unit was established in 1961, additional properties purchased, an addition built, a full-time administrator appointed, and a major building project completed in the summer of 1969. Many materials were donated from Sauder’s church furniture factory.

Sauder acknowledged the contribution of his wife to the welfare of Sunshine Home: “Mrs. Sauder has as much to do with the success of Sunshine Home as is attributed to me. It took the Board and a community to accomplish all that has been accomplished.

. . . . I want to continue pulling just as hard for Sunshine Children’s Home as I did the last ten years.” The Board presented Sauder with a plaque in honor of his ten years of service.

Sunshine Children’s Home is administered by Mennonite Board of Missions through its Health and Welfare Division. Glen Yoder is administrator. A five-member VS unit serves the Home as child care and maintenance workers.

Goods Begin New Witness in Longwy, France

Glen and Elizabeth Good recently moved to Longwy, France, to begin a Christian witness in that city of 25,000. They have been meeting twice monthly with eight adults and some children there.

Several families in Longwy are deeply concerned about the spiritual needs of their children and are eager to see a congregation begun. The Good’s work will include evangelism and teaching in the congregational fellowship. They are also assisting the French Mennonite Conference in preparing a catechism. The Goods are workers under the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions.

Michele and Marlyss Klopfenstein of Thienville, France, took over the Goods’ pastoral responsibilities at the Thienville Mennonite Church, Thienville, France, as of June 1970. The Klopfensteins assisted the Goods in this ministry since 1967.

Mental Health Scholarships Available

Mennonite Mental Health Scholarships worth $500 are again being offered to persons interested in a vocation related to the mental health field.

The scholarships, established in 1967, are awarded annually in recognition of the need for personnel and improvement in mental health treatment. The money is made available by the donated earnings of Mennonite Central Committee Voluntary Service workers at the Brook Lane Psychiatric Center. MCC VS and Mennonite Mental Health Services administer the scholarship program.

Candidates for the scholarships must be classified as college juniors, seniors, or graduate students. They must have a declared major, at least a C+ average, and show evidence of a vital interest and participation in the Christian church. Other factors considered in awarding the scholarships include the financial need of the candidate, previous service experience, attendance at a church-related college, and membership in a Mennonite, Brethren in Christ, or Church of the Brethren congregation.

Applications are available by writing: Director, Mennonite Mental Health Services, 1105 North Wishon, Fresno, Calif. 93728. Applications and supporting data must be received by Mar. 1, 1971. Scholarship grants will be announced on Apr. 1.
human, and what is degrading. "To provide food for every person on the planet earth does seem an impossible dream," the study guide declares, "but the human race at its best has often done the impossible."

A 33 1/3 rpm record accompanying the filmstrip concludes with "voices of the poor" talking about the meaning of hunger. These comments and conversations can be incorporated into the discussion period following the filmstrip showing or used in a variety of other ways.

A Very Old Question or Taxes, Tithes, and Other Table Talk, each with a study guide, are available rent-free from Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514. A complete catalog listing of more than 250 previously acquired film and filmstrip titles may be obtained from the same address.

Theologian Reviews Anabaptist Pacifism

Dale Brown, Professor of Theology at the Church of the Brethren's Bethany Theological Seminary, Oak Brook, Ill., recently spoke in chapel sharing some of his concerns on the topic of "Anabaptist Pacifism." After the chapel he met with interested persons for an informal discussion. Brown was in the Elkhart-Goshen area speaking on various peace themes under the sponsorship of the Elkhart County Council of Churches.

It was Brown's conviction that the traditional Anabaptist peace outreach must somehow "witness to the lordship of Christ in the life of the world," rather than being separated from it.

Brown is the present moderator of the Church of the Brethren. He is the author of two books. The most recent is The Christian Revolutionary, which is being published this fall.

Relief Committee Gives $26,000 Above the Budget

Mennonite Central Committee's year-end contributions received a substantial lift this week when an above-budget check of $26,000 was received from the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities Relief Committee.

Norman G. Shenk, Secretary of the Relief Committee, wrote, "I am happy to report action of the Lancaster Conference Relief Committee authorizing us to remit $10,000 of Try Hunger funds for the Paraguay Indian settlement and agricultural development programs, and $2,000 for the Jordan relief program specifically to purchase blankets and tents, the need for which was outlined in your Oct. 9 News Service release."

"From Food for Relief funds an additional $14,000 has been appropriated for the overseas general relief account without designating the area. This represents an above-budget appropriation while maintaining the monthly cash remittance that MCC routinely anticipates from us."

MCC is grateful for this kind of special effort on the part of the Lancaster Conference. An overseas budget decrease of 10 percent was announced in June, with the indication that it might be restored if the constituency response would make this possible. The MCC fiscal year ends on Nov. 30. Additional responses by concerned people until that date will be a major factor in planning for 1971.

Final OK Given on Music Building

On Sat., Oct. 17, the Mennonite Board of Education gave their approval for construction of the new Hesston College Music Building. The contract has been awarded to McBride and Dehmer of Wichita. The firm was low bidder with a projected total cost of $290,000 for the basic building.

Groundbreaking is set for early November. The Hesston Mennonite Church has purchased the basement of the new building for use by their youth, WMSA, and as a fellowship center. Total cost with the basement is $358,114.

Graduate Students to Study Freedom

"Freedom for the 70s" is the theme of this year's Mennonite Graduate Fellowship to be held Dec. 26-28 at Conrad Grebel College, Waterloo, Ont. The fellowship, an inter-Mennonite association open to all graduate students and other interested persons, has as its main activity an annual year-end study conference. It is made possible through voluntary financial contributions.

Invitations with registration cards are being sent out to graduate students over the mailing lists of the student services committees of the various Mennonite conferences. Persons interested in attending who do not receive student services materials should write: Robert D. Hostetter, 1000 W. 42nd St., Indianapolis, Ind. 46208. Program details are available on request. Registration forms should be returned by Nov. 20. A limited number of travel grants are available. Applications and contributions to this fund should be addressed to Paul E. Miller, Methodist Theological School, Delaware, Ohio 43015.

Persons attending the conference are invited to present papers on the general theme:

— How to be free in the ethos of Beckett, Camus, McLuhan, Agnew, General

Board Offers Audiovisual Resources

A film and a filmstrip dealing with the Christian's response to human need have been added to the audiovisual library at Mennonite Board of Missions.

In Matthew 11:16 Jesus asks, "To what shall I compare the people of this day?" A Very Old Question, a 13-minute black and white parable from Kairos films, repeats this question in a contemporary setting.

The story, presented in silent-screen fashion, suggests what can happen when persons become warped up in plans and procedures even while attempting to offer help to someone else. The film's two characters, Happy Harold and Neighborly Norbert, demonstrate unknowingly that often one's plan of action dictates what he will do next, even at the expense of the person being assisted.

Taxes, Tithes, and Other Table Talk, a filmstrip about hunger, contains no pictures of starving children with bloated bellies; neither does it dwell on the horror of the hunger experience. Rather, the filmstrip attempts to open the door marked "solutions" and get people talking about what is possible and impossible, what is Dime cards have inspired mission giving in the primary department of the Clinton Frame Mennonite Church, Goshen, Ind., according to primary superintendent Mrs. Levi Schmucker. The 80 children set a goal of $100, but by the end of the year had raised $130.74. The money was designated for use among Arab refugee children and Toba Indians.

Cards obtained from a local bank with space for 30 dimes were given to each child as their challenge. Children looked for errands and jobs to do in an effort to earn dimes. Whenever a card was filled, the child emptied it into a "golden jar" and the superintendent recorded the accumulating amount on the thermometer chart. Here Mrs. Levi (Millie) Schmucker and (l. to r.) Richele Thomas, Lyn Mascarenas, and Anita Mast count their missions contributions. (Photo by John R. Smucker.)
“How Would You Feel If…”

Editor's note: How does the church continue its witness in a war-torn country? Does the war help or hinder the church's effort? James Stauffer, an Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions worker on furlough from missionary service in Saigon, Vietnam, answered these questions in an interview, Oct. 18, on Focus, Eastern Board’s weekly missions newscast. This article is a summary of that broadcast including Stauffer's interview and related information.

The church in Vietnam shares its witness in several ways. First, the Christians need to sever their connections with ancestral worship. This is a real problem to know just where to draw the line on all these practices. Another way is through colportage work. Witness bands go out each week to visit in the community, distributing tracts and giving their testimony.

The church in Vietnam also has a program of evangelism-in-depth. They call it 'Evangelism Deep and Wide.' Some of them have a vision of bringing ten million people to Christ not within any special time period, but as the Lord may lead.

The church in Vietnam also witnesses through their social ministries. The young people, especially, are much concerned about the social needs of the country, as well as the spiritual needs.

Whether the war helps or hinders the witness of the Vietnamese church is a big subject. But let me just use one illustration to give you an idea of what the church there is facing. Let's suppose that America had just thrown off a colonial power and the country is temporarily divided at the Mason-Dixon Line as it was during the Civil War. In the South, a friend of the former colonial power supports one of the factions there and gradually takes control. Naturally resistance develops in the South because the people feel that they have not really been freed from foreign domination.

Then as this big power increases its support, the war enlarges and spreads to both parts of the country until it reaches the point where in proportion to the amount of foreign troops in Vietnam today with the population of the United States, it would mean that there would be about 13 million foreign troops in the southern part of the United States. Now this army has unlimited firepower and roved around over the country trying to destroy the other side and in the process destroyed many villages and killed many people.

Along with this came the associated evils of war such as prostitution, corruption, increase of crime, inflation which has gone away out of bounds, and the total social and cultural structure of the nation was upset. Then how would you feel if you were living in this country and perhaps had lost loved ones from the destruction of the war. Maybe your daughter was serving as a bar girl or had become a prostitute.

Then some Christians from that same country, the country which had this big army present in your land, came in and began to preach the gospel to you. How would you feel toward them? Would your first inclination be to accept their message of love and good news? Could you accept a gospel of love taught by persons from the country whose military might was destroying your country and killing family and friends?

When the war and destruction came to Saigon, the Mennonite missionaries quickly found ways to respond. They hauled drinking water and firewood; distributed food, clothing, and medicine; and received some of the homeless into their own homes for a time. For several months they shared in the rebuilding of dwellings in their neighborhood.

In the danger and uncertainty, God's message got through. Church attendance doubled. Membership has passed 50 and a national pastor has been ordained.

Pray for our missionaries. As messengers of God, they continue to declare that all war is sin, and to witness that in Jesus there is reconciliation.

Poetry Series Published at GC

Goshen College students and faculty in the Department of English have published a series of seven booklets devoted to poetry under the name, Pinchpenny Press.

Under the leadership of Nicholas C. Lindsay, assistant professor of English and poet in residence, 13 students have compiled an anthology of their own works called "Memory, Event & Image." They also compiled an anthology, "Confederate Dollars," of poems with themes of war, religion, and love, by University of South Carolina students, in an attempt to understand better the faith and life-style of the South.

Also in the series so far are two volumes by Lindsay, "Yes," and "Prince of Glory. Prince of Darkness, Prince of Beauty," a collection of poems performed at the 1970 Intercollegiate Peace Fellowship Conference at Laureleville, Pa.

One reviewer has written, "Lindsay's poetry reeks through the realm of Jesus' message: man committed to God, to other men, and to himself. It is the gospel of the poor and the exploited."

Nineteen works of a former student, Miss Elisabeth A. D. Wenger, of 1410 S. Eighth St., Goshen, Ind., have also been published in a separate volume, "Hail to the Brightness."

FIELD NOTES

The Annual Ministers' Week of the Lancaster Conference will be held at the Rohrerstown (Pa.) Mennonite Church with morning and afternoon sessions, Dec. 8-11. Special sessions are planned for the sisters on Thursday. Guest speakers will be Herman B. Reitz, Harrisonburg, Va., and Willard R. Mayer, Irwin, Ohio.

Twelve hundred persons attended the presentation of David, the Shepherd Boy during Eastern Mennonite High School's Homecoming, Oct. 17, 18.

Annual meeting of MCC (Ont.) to be held at Eden Christian College, Niagara-on-the-Lake, on Nov. 14. The guest speakers for the meeting will be Mr. and Mrs. Harry Martens, former MCC workers in the Middle East.

Reports of the work of MCC (Ont.) and MCC (Canada) will be the main feature of the morning sessions. Deliberations of Mennonite Disaster Service, Probation, and Parole work are afternoon features.

— Eli D. Wenger, Manheim, Pa.

I do appreciate the Herald and its many, many excellent thought-provoking and challenging articles. For several years, in fact, for several years, I have been a subscriber to your paper.
In the Sept. 8 issue, "What the Well-Dressed Woman Isn't Wearing," it should make us all stop and think.
We also appreciate the "living, breathing, hot off the press" by Celia Lehman, regarding women and equal rights, and that more men take leadership and more positive roles in the church, Sunday school, and home expressed my thoughts very well.
It is a privilege to be a subscriber to your paper. I have given you all the materials (including the Christian Herald) by Joseph Hertzler answered quite a few of my questions regarding the young people — the real young, who find and found as I did too the early years of cram saw the Lord, the church, and the church's problems. You have given us a good article which should be an encouragement and a big help to young people who have many of the same problems.
— Helen Lindhorst, Preston, Ont.

We realize that the editor may not agree with any of the articles (including the Christian Herald) as well known as the Mennonite Draft Resistance Movement, but some readers may have gotten the impression this is the group under discussion.
We are only three individuals and, therefore, cannot speak for all of them for first-hand experience, lifestyle, draft resistance, and war tax resistance, springing up among Mennonites and other groups.
Nevertheless, we consider ourselves part of that renewal-resistance happening and wish to mention some of the things we are for.
Due to the way people hear and pass things along, too often, what we are for is seen only in terms of our activities. That is unfortunate, it seems to be characteristic of the way people (including Mennonites) communicate, that the negative rather than the positive aspects of something new are emphasized. Perhaps this is because people (including the writers) tend to remember especially those aspects of a person, situation, or issue which might threaten our present way of living and therefore make us afraid.
Here are some things we are for which we are often remembered and talked about only in their negative appearances.
We are for putting conscience and the leading of the Spirit above all other demands may be made on us by the society around us. Since the only time society notices such a positive conviction is when the leading of conscience conflicts with the demands of society, for the established church, we are pictured as being antisociety, antigovernment, anarchist, anti-American, anticommunism, and even anti-church. Acts 5:29.
We are for living a full and abundant life wherein such things as being creative, enjoying beauty, relating to others, and living in greater harmony with nature are seen to be more important than earning a large fortune and accumulating material things. But the image spread around is that we are lazy, primitive, careless with money, and antimaternalistic. John 10:10.
Matthew 6:33.
We are for people being honest with themselves, free and open, spontaneous and creative in their expressions. This shows up in dress, speech, and the way we live our life. We are then accused of being disrespectful, irresponsible, different just to be different, and nonconformist. Romans 12:2.
We are for people sharing more deeply and extensively with each other. This must involve both our own personal life and the movement are trying to live this out in communal forms. However, pervasive sharing can also be seen as being against competition, against capitalism, against possessiveness, and against the private individual ownership of property. But why is it so frequently seen in its negative terms rather than that we are for greater sharing among everyone? Acts 4:32.

Another positive aspect... we are for people serving others in a truly voluntary way. One's whole life should be one of service regardless of sex or age. We are for truly voluntary service and, therefore, seriously question draft-induced "service." One should indeed serve his fellowman, but not because some military conscription system says "you have served" over sometime two years of government approved "service." The system must not be put above the Spirit.

We hope that all of us will begin listening for the positive from those who are proposing something different, and that we will pass on the good about those who are urging change, rather than listening for and passing along only the more threatening and sensational aspects.

Resisters are for many things.— Eli Hochstetler, Goshen, Ind., Douglas Hostetter, New York, N.Y., and Gaylen Freeheim, New York, N.Y.

Mary Hess surely put her pen on a Mennonite sore when she wrote "The Power of Insecurity" (Oct. 13). I pray God will lead many "secure" people to profit by this article. Even though we feel we've been somewhat victorious—by God's grace—it was still a challenge for us. I wish more would speak out against "Establishment" policies in these areas.

Let us say an "Amen, brother" for two more items: Virgil J. Benneman's "Christ, Israel, and Palestine" (Oct. 6) and the editorial on "Christians in the Arena" (Sept. 15). The Christian's craze for sports is incongruous, to say the mildly. Keep on being such a good gadfly, John—Stan and Mabel Kreider, Lancaster, Pa.

The Master Welder

By Don Kraybill

Shear Pins

Hay balers have shear pins. When the stress is too great the pin breaks and the trouble can be detected. Shear pins are usually the same strength and it’s quite predictable how much stress will cause a break. Shear pins in human relationships come in many different sizes. Some relationships break with little stress; others can contain unbelievable stress and strain. Too much weight on a chain snaps a link. Similarly human bonds may snap apart with a jolt. Other breaks are more gradual — shoestring breaks — they become frail and weak and finally break. A welder can solder the two separate bits of metal together again. The new bond is actually stronger than the old. Welders are important in human relationships to solder and weave two discordant lives into unison. Jesus was the Master welder by bringing man back into relationship with God.

Broken Relationships

Recently it was the day for late college registration. Hot, muggy weather made tempers impatient. Students had formed into two lines behind the controller’s counter to pay their tuition. It was the last stop in the registration line and I was in a hurry. I was already two hours behind my schedule. There was an open aisle between the two lines. It appeared that extra clerks were at the counter if someone started a third line in the center. “The line forms to the rear.” The voice was curt and hostile. I turned to rebut and say “there’s room for both of us here if you don’t like standing in line there,” but then thought how foolish. “Sorry,” I said, “guess I’m in too much of a hurry — you go ahead — I’ll wait.” Immediately the hostility left the atmosphere and there was a sense of reconciliation.

Many people are hostile, bristling like a growling dog. The hostility brings alienation and separation.

Hostility kills relationships. Mistrust stifles freedom and spontaneity in human relations. To the Ephesians Paul said Christ has broken down the wall of hostility. He has reconciled Jew and Gentile together and both back to God. Ephesians 2:14-16. Because of His death we not only have new communion with God, but have fellowship with the citizens and members of the family of God.

Welded Relationships

Reconciliation (a theological word for welding) has two rods — one pointed Godward and the other to our brother. The idea of coming together in reconciliation suggests a first stage of apartness, alienation, and separation. In Romans 5:10 Paul says that while we were still enemies of God, we were reconciled to Him by the death of His Son. The death of Christ reunites man with God in full harmony and fellowship. In the act of reconciliation God is working through Christ to bring man back to Himself not only in a new relationship but in changing man’s very being. To the Colossians Paul says they were once hostile evildoers. But Christ made peace through His blood to reconcile them back to God and now they are holy and blameless before God. Colossians 1:21, 22.

Reconcile — Then Worship

New relationship to God means new relationship with God’s people. It’s comfortable to sit in an armchair and theologize about reconciliation. Day dreaming about God’s act of reconciliation in Jesus Christ isn’t enough! Divine reconciliation is a profound wonder that shatters the human mind, but it must have an equivalent radical effect in human relationships. In Matthew 5:23, 24 Christ says to the effect that if they are taking an offering in a worship service and as it passes in front of you, you suddenly recall a brother with whom you have a broken relationship, you should leave your wallet at the service and go talk to your brother. After you have been reconciled to your alienated brother you can return to the worship and give your offering. We must be reconciled to our brother before we can worship. This is the difficult practical step of reconciliation. Worship from unreconciled brothers is totally unacceptable to God. It is not enough to sit and meditate about God’s great act without acting it out ourselves.

We had range houses for young chickens on our farm. They were located in the back pasture one quarter mile away from the barn. It was my duty to close the range house doors each evening after dark to prevent foxes from devouring the chickens. The walk to the range houses was dark and lonely. I dreaded it each time and ran for fear. The return to the main buildings and to my family was a warm satisfying experience. Back in the light was acceptance and love.
When God accepts man through Jesus Christ a new relationship is established. Now man is no longer isolated and alienated from himself. Because of God's acceptance he can now accept himself, created in the image of God. Because of God's acceptance and his new self-acceptance man can now also accept his brother as one also created in God's image.

A Christian brother served on a church committee with me. We met occasionally throughout the year. We talked and did our committee business. There was a sense of suspicion and mistrust in our relationship. Each time we met I became tense and tight. There was no overt antagonism, nothing tangible. We never had a debate or quarrel. It was a shoestring break. Recently the spotlight flooded our frail connection. We loved and accepted each other in a new way. A beautiful new spirit of freedom and trust pervaded our relationship.

Reconciliation Brings Acceptance

Reconciliation brings communication, fellowship, and acceptance. In 2 Corinthians 5:18 Paul says that Christ reconciled us to Himself and gave to us the ministry of reconciliation. We are to be ministers of reconciliation. We pass on the loving acceptance which God has given us. There are many levels of application.

Reconciliation may be most difficult of all places in church. In our church experience we develop beliefs and ideas about God. We formulate convictions and believe deeply. Conflict and hostility can emerge from different interpretations of the Scriptures. We may argue on certain theological stance excessively to the alienation of a brother. The Gospels seem to stress a relational as much as (if not more than) a doctrinal theology. In our theological debate, even if we are right but lose our brother in the process, our worship is not acceptable to God.

Rapid urbanization, higher education, and new styles of life are the sources of much social and cultural change within our brotherhood. Conflicting values, norms, and patterns will continue to create significant trauma and upheaval in the Mennonite Church in the future. Only as we become ministers of reconciliation to each other can we survive this era of rapid transition. The need for internal acceptance and reconciliation is paramount.

Reconciliation is needed in our homes. Home may be the most difficult community in which to shoe leather the gospel of reconciliation. In husband and wife relationships there will be differences of opinion, different purposes for the family, diverse goals, conflict of role understanding, and other tensions. Misunderstanding in these areas can break communication and relationship. Reconciliation is imperative to maintain a healthy family environment. Child-parent relationships may be strained. A parent may be projecting frustrated desires or goals on the child. The teens' lust for independence may create a counter reaction necessitating reconciliation.

Most people do some work. In the routine of daily work a variety of relationships is cultivated with diverse people. Sometimes these relationships may snap or shoestring. The power of divine reconciliation is needed to bridge the chasm of human hostility. A boss may be too demanding on his secretary or other subordinates by not being sensitive to the time requirement of certain jobs or the secretary's efficiency. The secretary may develop hostility and mistrust of the boss by comparing him continually with other bosses to prove he's unfair. Fellow employees may be successful in getting a raise even though they do less than you in the same time. Or perhaps you were exploited in a business deal—overcharged or not given the goods for which you paid. These breaks in human relationships need healing. Often it only comes when God's children take the initiative.

In-Between Agents

Not only do we need to reconcile our own relationships with others, but we need to be God's welders who can bring other men together. We are agents of God's reconciliation who can bring healing to fractured relationships. Polarizations are numerous and rapidly developing in our country: police—hippies; student—hardhat; dove—hawk; pro-establishment—anti-establishment; panther—Ku Kluxer and many others. God's agent of reconciliation must often be an in-between person who can stimulate reconciliation in hostility-moderation in extremism.

Reconciliation is difficult to write about. It is something that one must experience. Only a repentant style of life brings a reconciler. Is my presence in my family, church, and community a reconciling one? Are people finding new openness, communication, and freedom because of my presence and most significantly are men being reconciled to God because of my witness?

A Parable

The kingdom of God is like a treasure buried in a field. A man finds it and sells all he has to buy that field. This might be paraphrased by saying that a man was plowing in his neighbor's field. While plowing he discovered oil pouring out of a furrow. Quickly he stopped the tractor and checked to see if it actually was oil. Having confirmed that fact he hastily went home and told his wife. They decided to sell all their livestock, furniture, and land so they could purchase the neighbor's land. It was difficult to sell the furniture, but finally they did and were able to purchase the neighbor's farm.

Now the ministry of reconciliation is the oil. This is the treasure in our midst. It is the treasure in the Scriptures, in the history of the Christian church, and in our own heritage.
Many of us might be likened unto four types of farmers.

Some farmers haven't started plowing. They are sitting on rocking chairs watching everyone else. These are the very nominal church members who are only Christian in name but aren't aware of the rules or the name of the game.

The second type of farmer is plowing and he sees something black in the soil but he doesn't recognize it as oil—it looks like sewage to him so he disregards it and keeps on plowing. These are the Christians who have grown up in the church. They have been members all their lives but they don't recognize the treasure. They hear talk about reconciliation but it never strikes them as something personal and practical.

The third type of farmer is plowing, sees the oil, and recognizes it. He goes home to his family and they decide to sell out so that they can buy the neighbor's farm. But when it comes to the furniture and some unique equipment they stop and conclude that it's not worth selling these valuables just for the treasure. They are unwilling to sell everything in their life so that the treasure can have top priority. Many Christians find themselves in this situation. They know reconciliation by experience and study but they're not ready to make the ministry of reconciliation first priority in their life.

The fourth type of farmer is the one who sells out everything so that he can buy the farm. This is the true disciple. These are the Christians who give the ministry of reconciliation top priority in their style of living regardless of the cost. Their daily decision-making revolves around the priority.

Reconciliation is a gift from God through Jesus Christ the great Master welder. As sons in His family we are ministers of reconciliation to our brothers. Let's discover the treasure and sell out to give it priority.

Good Advice from John Wesley

Beware of schism, of making a rent in the church of Christ.

That inward disunion, the members ceasing to have a reciprocal love “one for another” (1 Cor. 12:25) is the very root of all contention, and every outward separation. Beware of everything tending thereto. Beware of a dividing spirit; shun whatever has the least aspect that way.

Suffer not one thought of separating from your brethren, whether their opinions agree with yours or not. Do not dream that any man sins in not believing you, in not taking your word; or that this or that opinion is essential to the work, and both must stand or fall together. Beware of impatience of contradiction. Do not condemn or think hardly of those who cannot see just as you see, or who judge it their duty to contradict you, whether in a great thing or a small. I fear some of us have thought hardly of others merely because they contradicted what we affirmed. All this tends to division; and, by everything of this kind, we are teaching them an evil lesson against ourselves.

O beware of touchiness, of testiness, not bearing to be spoken to; starting at the least word; and flying from those who do not implicitly receive mine or another's sayings!

Be exemplary in all things; particularly in outward things—as in dress—in little things, in the laying out of your money—avoiding every needless expense—in deep, steady seriousness, and in the solidity and usefulness of all your conversation. So you shall be “a light shining in a dark place.” So shall you daily “grow in grace,” till “an entrance be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.”
Publish It Abroad—How?

At times I get excited when I try to imagine what our Anabaptist forefathers would have done had they the present facilities to communicate their faith. They made the best use of the newest medium of their day — printing — as much as possible by writing many tracts, broadsides, and booklets explaining their beliefs, answering their critics, and speaking to society. They were interested in getting their message out even at the cost of their lives.

Hans Hergot of Nuremberg around 1530 was observed by the civic authorities with mistrust because he printed and distributed Anabaptist literature. His wife often managed the printing shop while her husband traveled selling his booklets, songbooks, and latest Anabaptist statements in the marketplaces.

Jan Claesz of Amsterdam had 600 books by Menno Simons printed in 1543. He was betrayed and beheaded the following year.

When the authorities raided the underground printing shop where Menno Simons' printer worked, they discovered ten tons of books. You better believe that was a lot of literature in those days.

What greater possibilities we have today. We have freedom of the press and freedom of speech. Yet nearly all which we have written about our beliefs and nearly all we are writing today is to ourselves. We state our beliefs for ourselves and to ourselves. The world hears little of what we are saying. We don't get it out to where others will read it.

Several years ago in one heavily Mennonite-populated area preparation was under way for a community-wide evangelistic crusade. Since the crusade was largely Mennonite-staffed, people of the community asked questions like, "Will all the services be in German?" "Are non-Mennonite visitors welcome?" Although Mennonites lived in this community for more than a century and although Mennonites had long before dropped the German language, the Mennonite religious life and beliefs seemed almost totally unknown and as foreign as another language to the community.

I am sure that the Anabaptists would use every media to speak out on pressing concerns. (Remember their public debates.) They would delight in printing their beliefs in the local and national newspapers and in every magazine possible. Few issues would miss their persistent witness.

Isn't it time we think of using the public media more, particularly the newspapers to proclaim our faith? Newspapers are usually open to ads. A few congregations have used the newspaper to tell their community the church's position on certain issues and invited inquiries.

After circulating its beliefs in the community one Mennonite congregation found its services overflowing. Even the mayor of the city attended to see what attracted the people. Being in a college town this congregation drew the interest of many college students who were interested in finding out more about a radical discipleship. What an opportunity to lead such into an understanding of the Scripture.

Mennonite General Conference through the years has adopted excellent statements on many different questions. Not only ought such statements be known and studied by the membership but also shared with our communities.

For instance in 1951 Mennonite General Conference adopted a statement on Peace and the Christian Witness. This declaration of Christian faith and commitment with respect to peace, war, and nonresistance affords a sound biblical basis for our belief and a good resource for any person or congregation in witness. What more current concern is there than this? Should our testimony be shared or kept to ourselves alone?

Before the current civil rights movement and heightened concern over race relations the Mennonite General Conference adopted a statement on The Way of Christian Love in Race Relations. This statement adopted in 1955 provides a biblical basis for a clear forthright stand on the Christian stance in race relations. Why didn't we help lead the way in facing this problem in a biblical way by publishing our belief abroad? The above statements and others can be had by writing Mennonite General Conference, Scottdale, Pa. 15683.

What might happen if your congregation carried a column in your newspaper entitled, "This We Believe"? In this column your congregation might publish your position on the above issues and others. Your church address might conclude the article with an invitation for further inquiries. Might not this be a good way to witness in our time and speak to the core issues people are concerned about?

Of course this will raise problems as well as possibilities. Some congregations may have problems deciding what they believe. The involving discussion could be most helpful. Certainly some reaction can be expected within and without. Some will be filled with worldly fear. However, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution."

But the possibilities are great. Many persons in our communities are struggling for answers. What an opportunity to identify with such in the search for truth, with the Scriptures in our hands.

Publicizing what we profess will also drive us deeper into the study of the Scripture ourselves. We also need this. We will be challenged in our stand but we will also be strengthened. For it is usually true that we are not confirmed believers on anything until we are challenged to defend what we say we believe.

Who will accept the challenge? Or who will share a better idea? Who will share the results of this approach? The overall pressing question is how well we publish abroad the message in our communities today. — D.
Part 1

Christian opposition to war is as important in the academic community as in other segments of our society. Education should not be an ivory tower removed from the issues of this world. One of education’s wholesome experiences is that across the United States expressions for peace have been designed and supported by persons who believe that there are multitudes of young people with a valid concern. Many feel that today’s youth ought to be heard rather than forced to get their hearing from more extreme positions.

A Christian View of War

It is essential that we think in terms of how to be Christian in our responsibility to our society and world. I will discuss the basis of Christian opposition to war from a New Testament standpoint, attempting to focus on what the Christian view of war should be.

The theme of “Christian opposition” to war recognizes that there are various objections to war but emphasizes those which are Christian. There is a distinction between purely humanistic approaches and those based on the revelation of Jesus Christ in the New Testament.

In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus said, “Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called [or known as] the children of God.”

In Luke 6 Jesus also said, “But I say unto you which hear, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloke forbid not to take thy coat also. Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise. For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. . . . But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.”

In John 18 Jesus said, “My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews.”

One other passage is Matthew 26:52 where Jesus said, “Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.”

So much depends on how one comes to the Bible as to how he interprets it. Recently a man reacted to my being a pacifist evangelist and said he could not cooperate in a meeting. His reason was that he believed the Bible to be a militaristic book and far from being a pacifistic one!

Our approach must be consistent with the total tenor of the Scriptures. God brought His revelation in history step by step to its great culmination in Jesus Christ. In our theological approach to the Bible, we do not have a flatbook view. We do not take Old Testament references and impose them on the New Testament. Rather we take the fullness of New Testament revelation to interpret the total.

Begin with Jesus Christ

The question of the Christian’s relation to war, therefore, must be answered by beginning with the New Testament, with Jesus Christ. This affirms that Christ brought the full meaning of God’s will for us. All the way through the Old Testament, God had something further to say about Himself and about His will for man. We see God and His will fully in Jesus Christ.

One can find incidents in the Old Testament where Israel was involved in war as the people of God. They enjoyed the blessing of God in victory and experienced defeat when out of favor with Him. But a study of the context makes it clear that God was meeting man where he was. He was demonstrating to people who worshiped their tribal gods that the God of Israel was and is God.

This is not to say, however, that the full revelation of Jehovah was there. Rather, we see that in the process of this revelation there is progress. Throughout the Old Testament, God always had something further to say until the New Testament. We read, “In the fullness of time, God sent His Son.” Again we read that “in these last days [God hath] spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things,” that is, the One in whom the whole cul‘minates. In Jesus’ words, “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil,” that is, to fill it full in meaning.

The Basis of Christian Opposition to War

A Holistic Concept

With this perspective, we must recognize that peace is a holistic concept. Peace is not, as some imply, simply the absence of war. It is far more than this; it is positive.
When the Hebrew word shalom is expressed, it means wholeness or soundness.

Senator Mark Hatfield has said, “Instead of talking about the balance of power as the answer to our problem and the way of peace, what we have in the world today is not a balance of power so much as a balance of terror.” The United States and the Soviet Union together possess explosive power equivalent to 15 tons of TNT for every person on earth!

This has become a balance of terror. In modern warfare it is impossible to be involved without being guilty of genocide. Those who defend war on the basis of its necessity and assert that it can be conducted by the terms of a just war must admit that this is impossible in modern nuclear warfare.

We cannot go into the “just war” theory here, except to say that multitudes of Christian people have accepted that theory for years. There are those who would like to imply that the Vietnam war is a just war. Actually we got involved in a civil war and found ourselves committed beyond what we anticipated; now we find it difficult to extricate ourselves.

But How Stop Communism?

But there are those who seek to make this a just war, saying that it is necessary in order to stop communism. I am also against atheistic, godless, tyrannical communism. Its emphasis is that the individual person is worthless. If a few people must die for the good of the cause, in this system, so be it. Christianity, in contrast, values every person as infinite in worth.

This value of the Christian faith is the best answer to communism, a practice of genuine love. If what we are doing in Vietnam is being done to stop communism, then we are playing the fool. A nation with a Christian heritage like ours should know that you do not stop communism by bombs and tanks. There are better ways. An embarrassing thing for Christians about the Vietnam situation is that we feel guilty because most of us had no mission of love there before the war.

We ought to be permeating the trouble spots of the world now. We should serve now as our brother’s brother. We should start now to heal the wounded and bind up the broken. We should do something now about reconciliation and understanding, and act in a preventative role rather than wait to cure a problem after it has fully developed. In our day we have become one world community, one world neighborhood, and the Christian faith is the only answer to the dilemma that we face.

Senator Hatfield told the 1969 Congress on Evangelism,
“Our neighbor includes anyone who lives with us on this globe. Consider the conditions of our world. . . . Picture our planet from outside of ourselves. . . . The inhabitants of that planet spend 15 times more money on creating weapons to destroy each other than on efforts to cooperate together for social and economic improvements. Yet 10,000 of its citizens die each day because they do not have enough to eat. . . .
Eighty percent of that planet’s wealth is controlled by only 20 percent of its inhabitants. The total wealth of those in developed parts of this world is broken down to an average of $2,107 for each inhabitant, yet the total wealth of the remainder of the world equals only $182 for each person.”

This quotation points out that the problem of war is not an isolated issue. It has to do with the whole problem of the human community, involving race, poverty, equal opportunity, and the freedom to be persons. To face this matter honestly means that we must look realistically at the larger question of sin. Senator Hatfield further stated,
“The war will cost us about $30 billion this year, one out of every five tax dollars. Currently we spend this at the rate of $950 per second. Most tragic and as of two weeks ago [October 1, 1969] this war has claimed the lives of 38,313 Americans, 95,961 South Vietnamese, and 451,847 enemy Vietnamese. Through our efforts, more than half a million Vietnamese have died because somehow we believe that they individually are our enemy, and a threat to our nation. We continue to measure our success in these efforts by the brutalizing nomenclature of kill ratios, by comparing how many of the enemy are killed for every American that dies. Christian compassion cannot remain quiet when the basic value and dignity in life is depreciated in such a manner.”

A Further Responsibility

The strange thing is that Christian people in our land have not recognized that there should at least be a great sense of guilt about sin, even though we may be divided on how to find the answer to it. It is not enough simply to speak about the Christian’s opposition to war. We must be involved in both prayer and dialogue. We have a responsibility to pray for the leaders of our land, for our President, and for those who can positively influence decisions.

The question before us is, “What is our approach as Christians to the war issue? From the New Testament it is to be a concern of reconciliation or of redemptive love. It is an active expression of redemptive influence which transcends nationalism and materialism and seeks to win all men to be brothers in Christ.

In the early church itself, according to Cadou and other historians, there was a complete renunciation of war and everything that produced war. Early Christians armed themselves only with love.

E. Stanley Jones has described the early Christians as saying, “I will match my power to suffer against your ability to inflict suffering. I will wear you down by my spirit, by soul force against physical force, by going the second mile,
by turning the other cheek,” until Rome finally stopped tor-
The Shaping Effects of Violence

By Levi Keidel

I tightened my grip on the wheel as the book van negotiated a rough section of dusty road approaching a Congo village.

"We've never been in this town before." Barnabas my colleague said, as he bounced in his seat belt beside me. See that road intersection? Let's stop there and sell. We've still time before going to the next town to camp for the night." We had rarely visited this part of the country. It was 100 miles from home. Its stony and sandpitted roads discouraged intruders; it had been plagued with internecine tribal warfare. This kind of war, like a blight, breaks out first here, then there, unleashing its ravages indiscriminately upon people one has learned to love.

There was the pastor and his wife who escaped death by submerging themselves in a crocodile-infested river and breathing through straws. There was the bookseller who with his wife, buried metal chests of books in the dirt floor of their hut, fled to the forest until war subsided, then came home, disinterred their merchandise and went into business again. There was the church leader who had told me how he with people of his village fled into a hail of bullets to surrender to the winning side, and how their wives were forced to spend the night with the warriors as part of the price for their salvation.

How do such experiences affect a person? Does the human spirit truly have the resilience to absorb the trauma of terror and hatred and lust and death without being affected?

Closed inside the rear van bed were three passengers whose missions symbolized the times in which we lived. Two were strange soldiers, on their way home on temporary leave from long tours of duty: the third was a church elder named David, who had come to trace out rumors that his married daughter who lived in this area had been killed in the latest strife.

We stopped at the road intersection, opened the doors of the side display cupboard, and began selling to a rapidly growing crowd. Soon some titles were depleted; I went inside the van to get stock to replenish them. When I returned to the side cupboard, I noticed a large French Larousse dictionary on its bottom shelf was missing.

"Where is the French dictionary?" I asked my colleague.

"I gave it to him to look at," he said, gesturing to a nearby handsome well-dressed black man who was over six feet tall and built like a fullback. My glance shifted to his hands. They were empty.

"Do you have it?" I asked.

"No, I don't have a dictionary."

"Hadn't he given it to you to look at? Just wait with me here a bit until we get this straightened out," I said, holding him gently by the wrist.

"Are you accusing me of stealing?"

"No, but I want you to stay here until we learn what happened to the book."

David the church elder, and the two soldiers began a hasty search in the crowd. Shortly they found the dictionary in the hands of one of the passengers packed into a nearby pickup truck which was on the point of departure. He said a friend had given it to him.

I released the man's wrist and replaced the dictionary.

during Christians." That perspective on history underscores the New Testament emphasis that we go out not by force but by love. We go to make our world an understanding community.

In our time, Martin Luther King brought to the American scene a new synthesis. This was not in the aspects he lifted from the New Testament but was by fusing them with a philosophy of Gandhian nonviolent resistance and synthesizing this application of nonviolence to "the kingdom of God in America" idea of nineteenth-century liberalism. King confronted those who held that nineteenth-century philosophy with a new dimension call to relate nonviolent resistance to the social injustices of our land and shook the country.

King expressed his philosophy in five basic points: 1) Nonviolent resistance is not a method for cowards. It takes more strength to stand for love than to strike back. 2) It does not seek to defeat or humiliate the opponent but to win his friendship and understanding. 3) The attack is directed against forces of evil rather than against persons who happen to be doing the evil. 4) It is a willingness to accept suffering without retaliation, to accept blows from the opponent without striking back. 5) It avoids not only external physical violence but also internal violence of spirit.

This synthesis has yet to be accepted by the masses of our society. Furthermore, if understood it has implications for world neighborhood! The strange paradox is that many people speak for peace but are still involved in violence. A great thing today is the opportunity we have in this nation of highlighting the fact that there are many people who are concerned about peace. It is in support of this quest for peace that I will now seek to explain the basic points of the New Testament approach.
"You may go. There is no problem. The matter is finished."
"The matter is finished?" he replied. "Oh no; it is not at all finished."
"What do you mean?"
"You falsely accused me of stealing. You will turn the truck around and go with me to the police station."
"But that's not at all necessary."
"It is. You have ruined my name before my friends and relatives here. The police will decide what amends to be made."

Congo society as it is, this man could have strong influence with the police. "This is surprising," I said as I got into the driver seat. "Why shouldn't the matter be finished? I'm sorry I troubled you." I started the motor.

He firmly grasped the window frame and mounted the running board. "Then I'm going with you 15 miles to police in the next town," he said. To proceed was pointless. I turned off the motor.

He dismounted and walked toward the rear of the truck. The crowd encircled us, making an arena in which we two were performers. A few of the man's close friends began to plead with him for reason. I left the van and cautiously approached them.

"Forgive the white man. He meant nothing by it."
"So he refuses to go to the police station? Then I will show him that he cannot accuse me of stealing and get away with it." He proceeded to take off his shirt, muttering vows of revenge.

The two soldiers who had been riding with us approached him. My spirits lifted. Surely their authority would bring the man to reason. But their efforts only added fuel to his rage. Bare chested, he fastened his eyes upon me and crouched to pounce upon me. Two of his friends grabbed his belt to restrain him, crying, "No no, Gilbert; don't do this evil thing! Don't do it!"

I fled to the driver's seat of the van and slammed the door. He rushed to the door and grabbed the handle to open it. I'd locked it. He reached for the inside latch. I was gripping it. He reached for the ignition key. My other hand covered it. He gripped the window sill and stared at me with inflamed eyes, his great chest heaving with rage, his huge nostrils flexing with each breath. Then he turned his back to me, and began venting his frustration with a tirade of threats.

Tension climbed for another quarter hour. Finally, his two village mates felt compelled to intervene. "Gilbert, we are your friends. We want to help you. You are a good man. Your name has not been blackened. You have never stolen, have you?"

Licking his finger, touching the dusty earth and gesturing toward heaven as if to call all its curses upon himself if he were lying, he said, "From the time my mother bore me to this day, no one has ever accused me of stealing. This white man has accused me of stealing, and the sun will not set before he pays for it."

I was caught hopelessly. If I went to the police station I could fall into a plot and spend the night in prison. If I did not go to the police station, I risked being beaten or killed. I had tried to escape, and had failed. The man appeared to be insane with anger. The sun was fast sinking. He would quite likely make good his threats.

Then Elder David approached the opposite cab window.
"I want to try something else. I want to give him a gift. May I take a book from the inside cupboards?"
"Why yes . . . take whatever book you like." Give him everything if need be, I half muttered to myself.

In a few minutes David stood nearby, holding a handsome gilt-edged leather-bound French-language Bible, looking for an opportunity to interrupt. Then it came.

"Excuse me, Sir Gilbert; would you accept this gift to cover our sin of having accused you of stealing?"

We waited breathlessly, our eyes fastened upon Gilbert. He looked at the extended gift, struggled in a long silence of indecision, looked at the quiet gentle face of the man offering it, then said with a broad smile, "Thank you; I accept it."

Tension dissipated. Friends rushed to Gilbert, assured him of their faith in his integrity, and congratulated him on his gift. We climbed into the van . . . my colleague and I in the cab . . . the two soldiers and Elder David in the rear. We proceeded on our way.

Was I finally free? Relief and gratitude overwhelmed me. David, an unpretentious layman; where did he gain such courage, such insight? How skillfully had defused a situation fraught with danger! Hadn't we heard other stories about this man?

Oh, yes, I recalled. He was one of few Congolese who possess an automobile. In the social disintegration which followed political independence, hatreds between his own tribe and a neighboring tribe were fanned into violence. Members of the "enemy" tribe had settled in his own tribal area, and had become his fast friends. Now in the midst of war, he shuttled these friends by the carload through villages of his own hostile tribesmen to their homeland and safety. This kind of conduct had become a way of life to him . . . willingly jeopardizing his own safety to deliver the lives of others.

Six weeks later I was seated at home. My wife opened a letter which had just arrived. As she read it, her face clouded with concern. She gave it to me. It was from a missionary friend who lived in the provincial capital of the area where the incident had occurred.

"Remember Gilbert?" he wrote. "He's in prison here. He got into an argument with the wife of a government minister. He went into a fit of rage and strangled her to death."

The lesson was clear. Violent revolution reveals the kind of person you've really been all along. Its stresses shape you into becoming more of that kind of person. It cannot leave you unaffected. It will mold you toward becoming either a David or a Gilbert.

Almost everyone knows the difference between right and wrong, but some hate to make decisions.
What Answer to Violence?

All assassinated.

Who next? Who will be the next human sacrifice to our American cult of violence? We are obsessed with it. Our heroes, films, plays, and books sing its songs; our papers, players, and artists glorify its style.

"Americans not only condone violence, we love it. We love to fight," says Dr. David Abrahamsen, a researcher in violence at Brandeis University. "Violence by gun is an American trait. We are still living under the legend of the Wild West where action—with a gun—was the easiest solution."

Stanford University psychologist Albert Bandura pinpoints why. "The whole culture has changed the violence syndrome into a cool guiltless routine of disposing of problems by disposing of the people who cause the problems."

Last year in America some 5,600 persons died of gunshot wounds. Contrast this with Great Britain where there were fewer than 30; France, under 20; Belgium, less than a dozen.

"We are a violent people with a violent history," says Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., the Pulitzer-prize-winning historian and aide to the assassinated President Kennedy. "The instinct for violence has seeped into the bloodstream of our national life."

Violence is here. Apparently to stay, which may be more than we can say about us and our society. Violence is among us on many levels.

There is the hidden violence of injustice that forces a man to be less than human. The violence of prejudice that dashes a man's hopes for happiness, shatters his self-respect, and thwarts life's meaning. "That's not violent," you say? Just ask the blacks. They know. They can tell you.

This sort of hidden viciousness breaks out as obvious violence doing injury to persons or property. People all around us are advocating it. Ku Klux Klan chaplain Reverend George Dorsett recently told a Klan rally in Raleigh, N.C., "We don't believe in violence and we don't intend to have any violence if we have to kill every Negro in America." That's what the brother said.

Or in response, there is the violence advocated by impatient or disillusioned liberals who, as Robert Fitch puts it, "Tremulously anticipate violence before it occurs, celebrate it while it is happening, and justify it when it is over."

Why is all this violence among us?

Some say it's impatience. The impatience of men whose dreams and ideals turn to despair. So the blacks on the bottom unleash the bitter violence of "burn, baby, burn!"

Others say affluence, prosperity, and permissiveness have made pleasure seekers and power seekers out of us all.

Still others say its cause is frustration. "Our society is built on success; success is measured by our materialism. If you don't have it, you're frustrated. Frustration is the wet nurse of violence."

Those who probe deeper say violence is simply hatred acted out. John Gardner, lately Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, writes: "Hatred triggers violence, violence stirs further hatred, savage acts bring savage responses, hostility begets hostility, and the storm rages on. At some point, the terrifying interplay must have an end."

Whatever the reasons given, and whatever the reasons actually are, none of them stand up to reason.

In the long view, violence is, has been, and always will be—the loser's way.

In personal conflicts, it's the man in the wrong who clenches his fist first. It's the man who is beaten mentally and morally who tries to settle it with muscle or maneuvering.

In social, national, or international conflicts, violence loses even when it wins. Will we ever look at history long enough to realize that killing of any kind, in any land, for any cause can never be a solution? Violence breeds more violence. Violence is never victory. "Violence" and "victory" are con-tradiectory. When one man strikes another down, the winner wins nothing but defeat.

"All they that take the sword shall perish by the sword," said Jesus Christ. Is there any doubt?

In contrast to our human way of violence, Christ called men to unclench fists, discard all weapons, weapons of violence, and learn the power of love.

But I say to you, [said Jesus] Do not resist one who is evil. . . . Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, so that you may be sons of your Father who is in heaven (Mt. 5:39, 44, 45, RSV).

Paul wrote:

Though we live in the world we are not carrying on a worldly war, for the weapons of our warfare are not worldly but have divine power. . . . See that none of you repays evil for evil, but always seek to do good to one another and to all. . . . Repay no one evil for evil, but take thought for what is noble in the sight of all. If possible, so far as it depends upon you, live peaceably with all. . . . never avenge yourselves, but leave it to the wrath of God . . . (2 Cor. 10:3, 4; 1 Thess. 5:15; Rom. 12:17-19, RSV).

His disciples understood Him perfectly. For the first two hundred years of Christianity not only nonviolence, but nonresistance was the practice of Christians. The church not only survived; it grew in great numbers and strength through three centuries of nonresistance to vicious persecution.

The Christian, who seeks to follow Christ in life today, chooses the way of nonviolent, nonresistant love as did his Master. The Master refused violence; so must he.

But he refuses violence because he also knows that love alone can conquer hatred. Only love can defeat violence. "Love" is the last word.

The man who follows Christ chooses the way of nonviolence because he knows God is on the side of right. God and justice will triumph in the end. No evil means can assist. No violent means can hasten. That was Christ's conviction.

The Bible says: "When he suffered, he did not threaten; but he trusted to him who judges justly" (1 Pet. 2:23, RSV).

This total faith in God's eternal future lets the true Christian accept suffering without violence and revenge. This is the way of Christ. It must be our way too.

Obviously it's a difficult way. Any appeal to the enemy's conscience bears great risk. But so do all the valuable things in life. The choice to love is the most risky choice in the universe. But in the end, it is the only alternative that will endure. Of all our motivations and decisions, only love is eternal.

It's a violent world. A world fast approaching its most violent age. "Discord and violence now are emerging as 'the wave of the future' from one end of the globe to the other," U.S. News and World Report stated sometime ago.

In such a world of violence the most viable alternative, the most valid approach . . .

. . . is the way of Christ.

It's the way of love—peace-making, nonviolent, nonresistant love.

Only a Christianity of love can survive with integrity in an age of violence; it alone can be Christian.

Besides, the Christian knows that only the man who knows, loves, and obeys Jesus Christ will survive after man and God have made this planet uninhabitable.

Do Christians know something that you don't? Indeed, they do. They have some very precise clues on where this escalating violence is leading. It's inside information known only to those who know the Bible.

Information that reveals what massive worldwide lawlessness portends. Can it be a final sign of the end of the age, of the world?

Have you thought long about these words from the Bible:

In view of the fact that all of these things are to be dissolved, what sort of people ought you to be? Surely men of good and holy character, who live expecting and earnestly longing for the coming of the day of God. . . . Because, my dear friends, you have a hope like this before you, I urge you to make certain that such a day would find you at peace with God and man (2 Pet. 3:11, 14, Phillips).*

An age of violence needs men at peace with God and man. Men who know Christ truly by following Him daily in life.

Will it be you?

In view of this world—and the next—is there any alternative to the way of Christ, the way of the cross, the way of love? Won't you take it?—David Augsburger, Harrisonburg, Va., delivered this message over the Mennonite Hour radio broadcast.

Doing What May Fail

“If a church is not trying things that sometimes fail, it is not living by faith. But if we are to attempt the things that may fail, we must have a place to stand (in Elton Trueblood’s phrase): a place to which we can return for encouragement and comfort and then for the nudge to launch out again” (p. 99, The Emerging Church, Larson & Osborne, Word Press, 1970).

SOME PEOPLE THINK...
Once in a while, back in the "olden days," the young boys would turn to blows to settle an argument. Immediately a crowd gathered. Once two boys tore into each other behind the old skating rink, and, of course, we all gathered to watch.

The father of one of the boys, a prominent businessman in town, instead of pulling the boys apart, acted as his son's second, and stalked around the squirming knot of boys, urging his son to really give it to the other boy.

The incident puzzled me then as does the present increasing trend to violence to settle disagreements. That father believed in violence as a good way to get even. The rest of us found it exciting to watch.

Roy Francis, in his book "Violence and the Mass Media," states that America is a land culturally committed to violence. He says the themes of force, speed, and violence appear in nearly every aspect of American public life. In fields of activity as diverse as sports and arts, violence is increasing. Consider games like football and wrestling, to say nothing of the newcomer, roller derby. Francis says that even baseball and golf have become mostly displays of power for the spectator.

When I hear people make statements that the students at Kent State who were killed got what they deserved or that we should not actively promote peace because God said there would be wars and rumors of wars, I am even more inclined to accept that people accept violence as necessary.

If we are culturally committed to violence as a way of life, the reason is that we have educated ourselves for this. The same book mentions that for more than 160 years American literature has shown a peculiar fascination for homicidal violence from James Fenimore Cooper's "The Last of the Mohicans" to the present.

Magazines and newspapers pick up the same theme. Fifty-five magazines, representative of the reading matter generally bought by the public, were analyzed as to subject matter. The astounding total of 2,524 incidents of violence and 1,261 incidents dealing with sexual themes were tallied. A total of 292,710 words were devoted to these subjects. Men's and police and detective magazines led in the amount of violence.

Movies and television are a particularly violent form of entertainment developed in and catering to what we have come to think of as an age of violence. Both of these media have a special affinity for violent behavior because they deal mainly "with things happening, and the extreme form of things happening is violence."

How much excitement and suspense can you pack into a film about peace and harmony? Life which is decent, orderly, and peaceful is not attractive on the screen or in a story. Even some so-called religious films find it hard to stay away from portraying violent incidents to keep the interest up.

"Violence and the Mass Media" points out that the Federal Communications Commission reported that between the ages of five and fourteen the average American child witnesses the violent destruction of 13,000 human beings on television.

A Stanford University survey found that the picture of the adult world presented on the children's hour on television is "heavy in physical violence, light in intellectual interchange, and deeply concerned with crime." Can this help but shape the child's attitude to adults and the part violence plays in a grown-up's life?

Last winter I asked one of my freshman college classes if they could remember a time without television. Only a few could. This younger generation was born and bred in an age of television. They have lived with it most of their lives. They accept it as natural, and the attitudes of their parents is also changing.

In 1967 J. Daniel Hess made a survey of the television viewing habits of a Mennonite community. His results, published in "Christian Living," showed that the families of this community, which ten years earlier had considered theater taboo, now watched about 80 hours a week.

Television has a particularly strong effect on the viewer because it has no back pews; everyone has a ringside seat. The bad guys and the insignificant good guys are killed with less compunction than most people squash a mosquito. Motor accidents, war news, riots, killings become a casual on-off affair. Now I see it; now I don't.

One of the results of studies reported in this book was that the education for violence to which we have knowingly or unknowingly allowed ourselves to be subjected makes us calloused to other's hurts and more ready to inflict injury on others when we get upset.

My concern is that there are grave implications for the person or family who soaks up the offerings of the mass media indiscriminately or who see as "art" anything new or avant-garde mostly as a reaction to the rigid position the church had toward culture in the past.

The cue to the church is not to ban all books, movies, television programs which are not religiously oriented. Rather, I think it needs to help its members test their spiritual values against the things they watch and hear. Maybe we need Christian critics of the secular press and television writing in religious periodicals to direct the way. Obviously we need more directional signals.

Thinking and Thanking

The word "thank" is the old form of the past tense of the verb "think." Giving thanks is giving thinks — letting the mind dwell on the things which God has given us. Some people think of thanksgiving as occurring only on the fourth Thursday of November. Thanksgiving Day was never intended to take the place of a thankful life, but to call attention to the importance of "always and for everything giving thanks."

We ought to give thanks to God in the morning that He has brought us safely through the night. We ought to give thanks for our food before every meal, and we ought to thank God at the close of each day for all that He has done for us. In between, there are "God's minutes" when, after a successful conference, a safe journey, or a quiet triumph over tempers, we can take a moment to lift our face and say, "Thank You, Father." We should become so accustomed to giving thanks that it would become as natural to thank Him as it is for a gentleman to say "thank you" to other people a hundred times a day.

Briefly Stated

All teachers and officers of the church were asked to stand for the consecration service. Good! But I wondered if the class members did not need consecration just as much. Generally, leaders and teachers prayerfully prepare for their work. Pupils are more apt to think of receiving than contributing and often fail to prepare the Sunday school lesson.

Thoughts for Thanksgiving

The worship most acceptable to God comes from a thankful and cheerful heart. — Plutarch.

The private and personal blessings we enjoy, the blessings of immunity, safeguard, liberty, and integrity, deserve the thanksgiving of a whole life. — Jeremy Taylor.

Pride slays thanksgiving, but an humble mind is the soil out of which thanks naturally grow. — Henry Ward Beecher.

A grateful thought toward heaven is of itself a prayer. — Goethe.

O Lord, who lends me life, lend me a heart replete with thankfulness. — Shakespeare.

If only I have the will to be grateful, I am so. — Seneca.

He enjoys much who is thankful for little; a grateful mind is both a great and a happy mind. — Thomas Secker.

A thankful heart is not only the greatest virtue, but the parent of all the other virtues. — Cicero.

Wit and Wisdom

Two old settlers in the West, both confirmed bachelors, got to talking about cooking.

"I got one of them cookery books once, but I never could do nothin' with it," said one.

"Too much fancy work in it, eh?" asked the other.

"Yep. Every one of them recipes started out the same way — 'take a clean dish' — and that settled it with me."

The preacher asked for testimonies at the close of a service. One lady stood up and said, "We are living in a wicked land where sin is all around us. I have had a terrible fight with the old devil all week."

Then her husband was heard to growl, "It's not all my fault either — she's tough to get along with."

Then there was the woman who was cured of her nervousness in one treatment. The doctor told her it was a sign of old age.

"Why do you always bow your head when you go up to the pulpit?" the six-year-old asked of her minister father.

"I am praying, my dear."

"And what do you pray for?"

"Why, I ask God to give me a good sermon."

"But, Daddy, why doesn't He ever do it?"

A small boy was asked to write what he had learned about the human body in his hygiene class. He wrote the following:

"Our body is divided into three parts — the brainium, the borax, and the abominable cavity. The brainium contains the brain, if any. The borax contains the lungs, lights, and heart. The abominable cavity contains the bowels of which there are five — a, e, i, o, and u."

The agony of nonconformity, the hurt at being shut out.

— Elaine Rosenberger
The September issue of Church and State said the Lodge appointment to the Vatican was wrong for the following reasons:

1. It violates the constitutional principle of separation of church and state. It links church and state and thus conflicts with the president's solemn oath to uphold and defend the U.S. Constitution.

2. It grants preferential treatment to one church and denies a "diplomatic hot-line to the White House" to the other 250 religious denominations in the United States. Since our churches hold a variety of often conflicting views on education, family and population planning, war and military service, and other important social issues, many denominations feel that they deserve a presidential emissary at least as much as the Vatican.

3. It is a form of government aid to one church, augmenting that church's prestige and strengthening its influence.

4. It is divisive. Citizens resent government favoritism toward one church. The appointment can only weaken interfaith good will.

5. It is an intrusion by the president into an internal church conflict. Since Vatican II most progressive Catholics have wanted their church to divorc itself of its political trappings and entanglements.

6. It could well lead to the coordination of policy between Washington and the Vatican. Our government should not coordinate its policies with those of any church.

7. It will be the entering wedge for deeper diplomatic and political involvements between Washington and the Vatican.

8. It is a form of acceptance by the administration of an old Vatican doctrine, that the pope is the "Prince of the Kings of the earth" and should receive the special recognition of and be allowed to advise all temporal rulers.

9. A Vatican envoy is not needed. Any religious leader who wishes to convey information or opinions to the president may use the means of communication available to all other persons and all other heads of private organizations.

10. A Vatican envoy is not wanted. President Nixon made the Lodge appointment in such a way as to bypass Senate review and ratification. The Senate would have undoubtedly followed public opinion and rejected the appointment.

For the second time in four months, London nurses in a state-maintained hospital brought abortions to a halt by refusing to take part in further operations.

The first incident occurred last June, when nurses at the Stepping Hill Hospital at Stockport revoked against the growing number of abortion cases and the distasteful task of disposing of fetuses.

Now, nurses have "struck" at Harold Wood Hospital at Romford, just east of London. The hospital’s secretary, H. J. Sallis, told newsmen:

"There has been a certain amount of resistance to abortion operations, and nurses are becoming increasingly upset by the growing list of abortions. We have not got sufficient willing nurses to deal with the growing number of patients. The situation is acute."

Donors to religious and other charitable organizations were told that year-end gifts in 1970 will result in greater tax savings than gifts made after Dec. 31. Conrad Teitell, tax lawyer and publisher of the monthly Taxwise Giving guide, explained that several factors which become effective in 1971 will make year-end gifts in 1970 beneficial to the donor.

"You are likely to be in a higher income bracket this year than next because changes made by the new tax law which reduce your tax bracket are not effective until next year," he said in a pamphlet entitled Charitable Contribution . . . Wise 1970 Year-End Tax Moves.

Among factors cited were these: the present 2.5 percent surcharge is expected to be dropped; personal exemption which has been raised from $600 to $625 this year, will increase to $650 in 1971, to $700 in 1972, and $750 in following years.

"The higher your tax bracket, the greater the tax savings for your charitable gift," Mr. Teitell said.

He explained, for example, that a gift of $1,000 made by a person in the 45 percent tax bracket saves $450 in taxes, while the same gift in the 35 percent bracket saves $350.

A black Baptist pastor has called for a cease-fire between evangelicals and social activists in the church.

Speaking at the 163rd annual meeting of the New York Baptist Convention, the Rev. Granville A. Seward said, "Let us have a cease-fire between these two camps. Both are wrong. Both are inadequate. We need the wholeness of both working together."

The Newark, N.J., minister said neither the approach of spreading the gospel and saving souls nor the stressing of the social gospel was adequate by itself.

Both approaches are needed, he insisted. "We must be both evangelists and social activists."

A United Church of Christ executive has described the Arab-Israeli conflict as a "fight between relatives" and warned that there is no military solution to the problem.

"A fight between relatives is always more intense, and that is what we have here," Dr. Alfred Carleton, executive vice-president of the UCC Board for World Missions said in an address at Portland State University. He discussed the "Role of Religious Communities in Middle Eastern Countries."

Dr. Carleton noted that "the Jewish, Christian, and Arabic cultures and histories are so closely entwined and related to each other - Israel, after all, is really the promised land to not one religion, but three."

A career missionary and educator in Turkey for 30 years, the executive predicted a shift in the balance of power now that Nasser is dead, but doubted that the basic situation would change.

A "drug scene dropout" and former disciple of the "high priest" of the LSD cult told a Catholic college audience that drug abuse "is no longer a minority problem."

Statistics reveal, he said, that 15 percent of all men over 30 and 25 percent of all women over 30 use — "and abuse" — drugs.

Allen Y. Cohen, an assistant professor of psychology and dean of men at the experimental John F. Kennedy University near Berkeley, Calif., said the drug problem is "very widespread, very profound," and a "scary proposition."

A former pupil and follower of Dr. Timothy Leary, the noted drug cultist, Mr. Cohen told students at the Loras College field house that everybody figured that LSD was going to change the world" and didn’t.
Minority Ministries Council Holds First Annual Meeting

The first annual meeting of the Minority Ministries Council was held at the Wabash YMCA in Chicago, Oct. 16 and 17, 1970. Gerald Hughes, Cleveland, Ohio, chaired the plenary sessions. Sixty-five representatives, chosen and sponsored by 35 minority churches, attended the sessions.

The council presented reports on Minority Ministries programs, reviewed its development since its inception in 1968, referred its proposed constitution back to committee for final revision and mail adoption, elected five persons to serve on the Executive Committee, and agreed to meet annually. A Presbyterian minister from Korea pastoring a church in Philadelphia, unexpectedly shared in the sessions. Unable to find the meeting he was to attend, Rev. Kim stopped at the MMC meeting and was so impressed by the encompassing concerns being dealt with that he remained as an observer for a significant part of the sessions. He wondered why this kind of minority ministry could not be extended to other denominations.

John Powell, executive secretary of the MMC, addressed the meeting on “The Voices of God: The Role of Minority Churches.” He stated that the minority people themselves could be the enemy that takes advantage of the minority churches if they allowed themselves to be captives to: (1) division on the parallel interests shared among and within the various minority groups, (2) lack of involvement in leadership capacities, (3) indifference toward their own problems, (4) a refusal to use civil and divine rights which we already possess, (5) an endless and vain search for a substitute for the minority church’s active Christian involvement in politics, education, and social life.

Powell further said that if Jesus means freedom, then the minority church must develop a mass base for involving all of the minority constituency in a viable Christian life. A sincere leadership obeying none but God and neither compromising nor seeking a middle ground to follow in the power of God is needed, he pointed out. He added: “The minority churches must have the implicit faith which says we are the oppressed and God is making His glory shine through us. The minority churches must close the gap between social action and evangelism and talk about the Christian experience here and now.”

The proposed constitution of MMC provides for active membership of all minority churches and associate membership of persons not related to minority churches. It provides for inter-Mennonite relationships. The meeting heard and registered excitement for the work of Minority Ministries Education being led by Lynford Hershey. Besides program administration the MMC will continue to provide overall guidance to the Mennonite Church as it moves into minority communities.

A recommendation was approved that the MMC publish a monthly newsletter for minority churches and other interested churches. The executive office is also faced with the task of developing a stronger economic base in minority churches and helping to provide more pastors for minority churches.

The newly elected executive committee includes: Sammy Santos, chairman, Bronx, N.Y.; Hubert Brown, vice-chairman, Goshen, Ind.; John I. Smucker, secretary, Bronx, N.Y.; Lupe De Leon, Corpus Christi, Tex.; and Warner Jackson, Cleveland, Ohio. The committee will meet four times annually. The 1971 annual meeting will be held Oct. 15 and 16 in Detroit, Mich.

MMC Annual Meeting: A Participant’s View

To be present at the first annual meeting of the Minority Ministries Council in Chicago, Oct. 16 and 17, 1970, was indeed a thrilling and inspirational experience. It also represented frustration and anxiety for me, a white middle-class Mennonite Christian. The inspiration came in the form of Spanish, Indian, and black men. These were Christian men, Mennonite men—products of the mission outreach of the Mennonite Church.

It was encouraging to see these men exemplify the fact they were human. Not always did things go well. There were disagreements and even accusations. A spirit of unity prevailed, however, in spite of the many problems caused by different racial backgrounds, language, and geographical locations. A common unity already existed in that here were people who had experienced the projection of prejudice and hatred. However, the predominate spirit of unity was in the one God and Savior, Jesus Christ, and in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.

The feelings of anxiety and frustration on my part were aroused as I heard these men express.

Thanks—I was in sin, I was lost. I was not a man. Now I know God. I am a new man, I am free, I am saved. Thanks for the effort of the Mennonite Church. You gave of yourself, you gave financial assistance to those who came and told me of God.

Praise—Because of what you did I am proud to be a Mennonite. For what I am you allowed me to become by an introduction to Jesus Christ through your church and its programs. I am happy and proud to be a Mennonite.

Commitment—They responded to the teaching we gave; “You decided and became a Christian, now you in turn become a minister to your people.” We trained them well in the principle of giving self to Christ. Many developed a zeal for taking the good news to their fellows.

Frustration—In the attempt to respond to our teaching and the tremendous need... seen among their own they turned to us for help. We promised to pray—and we do: we promised to supply personnel—and we try; we promised financial help and then we say there is none.

We invite minorities into our churches and homes and they see affluence, they see their need, they hear the cry of their people, they see our affluence; they hear the ones who first told them of God, Christ, faith, and commitment. They attempt to respond and we pray. There is frustration when they see their need and then see our affluence, when they hear our prayers and then hear their fellow white co-workers saying there is no money for program or pastoral support.

What of the hope we once gave? Now we attempt to justify why we do not give and back up our justification by saying that the purpose of the church is to win souls. The minority church hears and remembers our teaching of 1 John 3:17. We teach that in Christ there is no East or West, bond or free, Greek or barbarian; we are all one brotherhood, yet continuing references to "we" and "they" hurt us both deeply.

As a white, privileged to attend the annual meeting of minority churches, I felt ashamed. Ashamed because I was not always the brother I could have been. By trusting our fellowmen we truly show ourselves as brothers and sisters. Showing love in Christlike compassion, we will move together in Christ in mission.—Lynford Hershey Mennonite churches in Curitiba, Brazil, and in all of Paraguay are being visited from Nov. 16-30 by students and faculty of the Mennonite Seminary in Montevideo. (Not pictured: Prof. Henry Dureck.) Three seminary faculty members—John Driver, B. Frank Byler, and Daniel Miller—are sponsored by Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. Student enrollment in 1970 was 29. Graduation exercises for the 1970 school year closing were held on Nov. 8.

Rees Challenges Students

"There is an all-outness about Christian discipleship," emphasized Paul S. Rees, Vice-President at large of World Vision, during a week of spiritual renewal services at Eastern Mennonite College, Sept 28 to Oct. 2.

"Let's have no more vagabonding among half loyalties," said Rees. He spoke pointedly on commitment and discipleship during the week to EMC's 925 students.

"It is imperative to say, 'I can with Christ,' and maintain a positive attitude," he noted. "Even though we may think we are nothing, God hung the world on nothing. Doesn't that open an impressive range of possibilities for what God can do with our nothing, if we let Him?"

Rees challenged the Christian to respond boldly as a "listener among the listeners and a speaker among the silent," while realizing the power resources of the Holy Spirit.

To illustrate that Christians are not taking advantage of all that God has to offer, Rees told of an experience in an Irish hotel. He and his wife did not discover their attached private bathroom until ready to leave. "It was there all the time but it didn't do us any good because we didn't know about it. God has hidden rooms which don't benefit us if we don't discover them."

"We're suffering from an overdose of the ordinary," Dr. Rees continued. He urged Christians to live extraordinary lives in extra rooms avoiding ordinary thoughts, motivations, and sacrifices.

"We must bear a cross to follow Christ." He explained that a cross is not simply anything that is hard to bear, but it is that in a person's life which represents the cost of his discipleship.

During his 20 years as a pastor and now more recently in his work with World Vision, Rees related that people often justify their questionable ethical stands with, "Well, a man's got to live."

"But that's not true discipleship," emphasized the evangelist. "The Bible says, 'It is appointed unto man once to die,' but it never says man has to live. We must renounce the bad and the good things about us and let Christ set up His shop within."

Rees concluded the week with a mandate for mission: "As the Father has sent me, so send I you." He noted that Christ's command is the mission of the whole church to the whole world in a scheme of shared responsibility.

Reviewing the week of services, Student Government President Nathan Showalter called them "the best I've ever experienced at EMC. Rees gave the week a touch of intellectual concern rather than emotion."

Paul Erb, visiting professor of English and Bible, confirmed, "My head tells me that Dr. Rees was preaching the gospel this week, and my heart also gladly affirms this."

Dams Built in India

Severe famine struck Bihar, India, in 1967, and Mennonites responded with a large relief program. The Mennonite Relief Committee involving Mennonite Central Committee, Bihar Mennonite Church, and Bihar Mennonite Mission was formed to distribute food. Food-for-Work projects got food to needy people who built wells, schools, and roads. In 1967 and 1968 the Mennonite Relief Committee was responsible for the construction of more than 250 wells.

For the past two years the Mennonite Relief Committee has emphasized agricultural development and the training of local farmers. In keeping with this shift of emphasis from relief to development, the Mennonite Relief Committee has changed its name to Mennonite Service Agency (MSA).

MSA's first six-month report for 1970 showed a wide variety of activities planned to help local farmers increase food production. Indian agricultural extension workers are introducing improved rice, wheat, and vegetable seeds to local farmers. They also demonstrate the use of fertilizers and pesticides and test soil conditions. Two tractor-operated pumps and thirteen portable pumps are rented to farmers who pump water for crop irrigation. Thirty-three farmers attended two training courses recently held at the Ranch Agri-cultural College.

The Food-for-Work projects have changed from digging wells to building dams. One dam is able to provide more irrigation water for more farmers than several wells. The Bihar government has encouraged the building of dams rather than wells.

MBI Elects New Board Secretary

Norman H. Derstine, Harrisonburg, Va., has been elected secretary of Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., Board of Trustees, at its recent annual meeting in Harrisonburg. Derstine was the program director of the Mennonite Hour, an MBI production, from its inception in the early 1950s until 1961. Following this, he accepted a position in the overseas missions division of the Mennonite Board of Missions in Elk-hart, Ind. Before returning to Harrisonburg he served as pastor of the Roanoke Mennonite Church in Eureka, Ill. Since August 1969, he is serving as director of church relations at Eastern Mennonite College.

Reelected to the MBI Board of Trustees Executive Committee were Lewis E. Strite, Harrisonburg, Va., president; John R. Martin, Neffsville, Pa., vice-president; and Donald E. Showalter, Harrisonburg, Va., treasurer.

Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., Harrisonburg, Va., is the mass communications division of the Mennonite Board of Missions.

Edison Center Established

October 25, 1970, will long be remembered in this delapidating part of Kalamazoo, Mich., as the forces of two denominations worked together to get the Edison Neighborhood Center into operation. The local Mennonite congregation, donating $400 of Compassion Fund money above its regular $6.00 per member contribution to the Mennonite Compassion Fund, joined the Michigan Conference of the United Methodist Church to launch the Edison Neighborhood Center.

On Oct. 25 Lloyd Schloof, pastor of the Stokbridge Methodist Church, presented to Miller Stayrook, Executive Secretary of the Edison Neighborhood Committee, a check for $12,000, underwriting the major part of the Edison Neighborhood Center activity for this year in this citation which was read to the assembled congregation. Rev. Schloof made the following citation to Mr. Stayrook: "To Miller Stayrook, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be a social worker in the evangelism of family crisis prevention and neighborhood action. He is also separated unto the gospel of God in the evangelism of search for housing for the poor, for bringing preventive redemption to them from congestion, dirt, and disease, potential sources of moral evil and sin."

The Center is a school-focused neighborhood center to retard delapidation of an urban neighborhood by planning for prevention and remediation of neighborhood and family personal problems. As stated in objectives to the Methodist Church, the Center lists its goals as reconciling race with race, poverty with affluence, parents and child, spouse with spouse, dropout with society. It also is implicit in this objective with the establishment of a closer and more relevant contact with community agencies and services in this neighborhood to deal with the problems such as delinquency, housing, poverty, high rate of transience, and low school achievement.

The avowed purpose of the program to link this neighborhood with the helping organizations of the larger community suggests that the basic approach will be to organize neighborhood groups around problem areas to make diagnostic studies of the neighborhood and have this done by continuous contacts of groups and individuals with the families of the neighborhood. As the result of these contacts crisis intervention as needed will be provided. Referral networks with community agencies and services would be built to assure the delivery of this service to the residents of the neighborhood. Another goal of this Center would be to coordinate the services so that adequate service would be provided without duplication. Group processes would be used to further the social integration by having the residents interact while coping with the environmental problems.

The money provided by the Methodist Fund for Reconciliation and the local Mennonite Compassion Fund will be used to staff an office with a social worker and a half-time secretary. The social worker will be aided by students from Field Work Training from Western Michigan University's Graduate School of Social Work to provide the intervention type of services and supportive types of casework services as demanded. The Edison Neighborhood Committee is already functioning in a Steering Committee capacity and is formed by a wide cross section of the neighborhood from senior citizen to teenage-young adult representation, from businessmen to parents, and to the various church leaders, whether they be Catholic, Protestant, black or white.

The objective of close cooperation of community and agencies of services can be seen in the fact that already the school system of Kalamazoo has cooperated and participated with the Boys' Club of America in providing a Boys' Club in the school building. The city administration has enacted several significant things in cooperation with the schools and the Boys' Club by providing a lighted basketball court in the area. Community service agencies are moving in as the need arises.

Mr. Stayrook, Executive Secretary of the Center, will direct the social work staff of the Center. He is a member of the Kalamazoo Mennonite Church and has participated in church activities through the Mennonite Central Committee in the Middle East, with the Mennonite Board of Missions in Algeria, church schools in eastern Pennsylvania, and the church camp of the Indiana-Michigan Conference.

“A Well of Living Water” Provided

A new witness for Jesus was recently begun in Guatemala as Eastern Board missionaries Richard and Lois Landis held meetings in Brigada, a lower-income area of Mixco, Guatemala. Approximately 800 families inhabit Brigada.

When the missionaries first visited the area, they discovered that all the people were without water. Each house has a well of about 200-foot depth but when nearby Guatemala City drilled two wells, each 800 feet deep, the water table was lowered and the people were left without water.

The Landises worked through various plans for getting water with the people but they were unable to implement any of them. The town officials of Mixco have promised to work with the Brigada group and the missionaries in drilling a new well in the future.

After the Landises had worked with the people of Brigada on the water problem, they began looking for a place to hold worship and evangelistic services. Even though they knew and trusted the Landises, many of the people were hesitant to open their doors to evangelical missionaries because of their Catholic ties.

A room large enough for 40 people was found and on July 12, the first public church service was held with twelve Guatemalans attending. Two months later the Sunday evening services were overflowing, so the owner of the meeting room and Richard

Landis worked together to enlarge the room to seat 70 people.

Landis reports that two people, a man and his wife, have accepted Jesus. In October, ten nights of evangelistic services were planned with a Honduran Mennonite pastor serving as the speaker.

Richard Landis wrote, "While we have not obtained water for the kitchen sink, we are praising the Lord for His living water which He is giving us through His Word. Pray for the new believers and for the new church which the Lord has started that it will be a well of living water in Brigada."

MDS Region One Meets

Region One of Mennonite Disaster Service met on Oct. 24, 1970, at the Weavers Mennonite Church, Harrisonburg, Va. This was Region One’s eighth annual meeting. Seven area representatives reported their local activities. These came from New York: Philadelphia, Pa.; eastern Pennsylvania; western Pennsylvania; Lancaster, Pa.; Chambersburg, Pa.; and Virginia.

Region One of MDS includes all the states on the Eastern Seaboard and Alabama. MDS is the most unstructured organization in the Mennonite Church, yet is one of the most readily workable organizations in the Mennonite Church. MDS does not emphasize the raising of funds or material aid. They contribute the work of their hands, and experience shows money is easier to give than labor.

Chairman Landis Hershey reported that no other denominations, not even Adventists, have anything like MDS.

A special report was given from Nelson County by Reverend Roach, a Protestant Episcopal minister. He is pastor of three congregations in Nelson County and he praised the skill and the dexterity of the MDS organization. He pointed out the fact that the joy of Jesus came to Nelson County through the Mennonites. He said he would welcome disaster if it could come without the loss of life, because the disaster in Nelson County turned out to be a blessing.

John Martin, a minister from Stuarts Draft, Va., also reported. Martin devoted time in a spiritual ministry in Nelson County. It is estimated some 16,000 man-days of work were contributed to Nelson County residents.

The election of officers brought a new member into the executive committee of Region One. Alton Miller of Springs, Pa., replaces Russel Mumaw as secretary-treasurer. The three-man executive committee now includes Landis Hershey, chairman; Jonas Kanagy, vice-president; and Alton Miller, secretary-treasurer. Approximately 125 guests were present for the evening fellowship meal. Next year Region One will meet at Big Valley, Pa.

MCC Peace Section Serves One Third of Mennonite I-Ws

Mennonite and Brethren in Christ programs had 932 men in service who were securing I-W credit from Selective Service as of Oct. 1, 1970. This is down from the 1,200 I-Ws in service on Jan. 1, 1970, which was the largest total number in church-related programs since the cooperative Selective Service umbrella was established by the Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section in 1951. These 932 represent approximately one third of the total number of Mennonite and Brethren in Christ I-Ws. Many persons call these 932 VS, Pax, or TAP workers, rather than I-Ws, since they are involved in these church-related programs. But from the point of view of Selective Service, all men working in alternate service assignments are I-Ws.

The MCC Peace Section serves the various constituent groups as their liaison with Selective Service. This involves keeping in touch with the legal status of the draft and the numerous regulations which undergird the mechanics of the system. The Peace Section is the Selective Service approval arm for service projects of the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ mission boards and most church-related health and welfare institutions. Currently Selective Service has approved over 500 separate projects in the United States and Canada for the Peace Section. There are also approved projects in 45 other countries.

Most processing of I-Ws in church agencies is perfunctory. But every week there are at least a dozen problem cases which require special counseling or personal contact with local, state, or national Selective Service offices to clarify points at issue. Each I-W in church-related service has a file at Akron headquarters where copies of the registrant’s working papers are kept. These papers include a letter of acceptance into the church program, procedural letters to each I-W, and his order to report for work from Selective Service. Each I-W has a minimum of six separate items in his file. David Worth, Peace Section administrative assistant, observed that in an average week he processes over 60 separate items in addition to special counseling.

MCC Begins New VS Unit in Akron, Ohio

The Mennonite Central Committee’s Voluntary Service office has added another inner-city project to its program with the beginning of a unit in Akron, Ohio.

The unit will be associated with the...
A nonprofit organization begun by Samuel M. Chambers to meet the housing needs in disadvantaged areas. Since 1968, Chambers, a black contractor, and other volunteers have worked at this project on a weekend basis only. Students from Akron University and other interested persons helped in the initial program. Realizing the tremendous need and value of such a program, Chambers sought and received support from the community to expand the project to a full-time operation.

ARCH's main purpose is to develop a program which will help meet and overcome the housing shortage in Akron. Their method is to buy and rebuild existing houses of basically sound structure and then resell them to the poor people at a price which is much lower than another house with equivalent facilities. ARCH charges only for the materials needed to rebuild the houses; plus the initial cost of buying the home. A poor family can thus buy for less than $10,000 a house that would normally sell for $20,000. ARCH makes no profit on the houses it sells.

David Brunner, pastor of the Summit Christian Fellowship, Barberton, Ohio, and a Board member of ARCH, was instrumental in inviting MCC to begin a unit in Akron to work for the ARCH program.

Presently in orientation at MCC headquarters are Paul Hartman, Elida, Ohio, and Leon Good, Marietta, Pa., who will be the first VS-ers to serve in Akron. Hartman, who has served on several MDS construction crews, will serve as a construction supervisor for ARCH. Good will be working in the ARCH office assisting people with the paper work involved in obtaining FHA loans to buy houses from ARCH.

MCC VS Director, Paul Leatherman, has hopes of expanding the Akron unit in the future by finding available positions for other VS-ers with social service agencies in the city. Hartman and Good will live in the area in which they work and will maintain a fraternal relationship with the Summit Christian Fellowship.

Seminars, Courses for Laymen and Pastors

An Inter-Term will be held at the Associated Seminaries, Elkhart, Ind., Jan. 4-22, 1971, making it possible to offer several seminars and courses not possible before. Classes will meet both on and off campus. There will be an Inter-Mennonite School for Ministers and a Mass Communications Seminar. Several of the offerings have been specifically aimed and prepared for pastors and Christian workers who are presently engaged in their work.

On campus credit courses to be offered include a course in "Group Leadership and Group Dynamics" to be taught by Paul M. Miller. "Doctrines of Baptism and Lord's Supper" will be offered by J. C. Wenger. J. Massingberd Ford, Professor of New Testament Studies at the University of Notre Dame, will teach the course, "The Apocalypse of John." in the capacity of visiting lecturer. Ford is presently engaged in writing a commentary on the Book of Revelation in the Anchor Bible Series.

Several faculty members will be off campus involved in teaching ministries through affiliations with congregations. There will be no academic requirements for these courses except for those who request credit.

A "Jesus Seminar" has been tentatively scheduled to be taught by Clarence Bauman at Arvada, Colo., Jan. 11-23, 1971. Howard Charles will go to Lancaster, Pa., to teach a course on "The Letter to the Hebrews," Jan. 11-14, 1971. An Old Testament study theme will be taught by Jacob J. Enz at Henderson, Neb. The dates for this course have not been finalized. Orlando Schmidt will conduct Church Music Workshops in Ontario. Ross T. Bender will be in Lancaster, Pa., to teach a course in "Family Life Education" during January and February, 1971.

The Maple Grove congregation at Belleville, Pa., has given Pastor Waldo E. Miller a six-month leave of absence because of kidney surgery and transplant. Samuel Glick, Sr., Belleville, Pa., will serve as interim pastor. Correspondence of church-related material should be referred to Bro. Glick during this interim period.

Plans are for Bro. Miller to have a kidney transplant from his brother Wilmer, Nov. 17 at the Cleveland Clinic, Cleveland, Ohio.

Available: approximately 150 Church Hymnals and 150 Life Songs from Erb Street Mennonite Church, Waterloo, Ont. If interested write to: Mrs. M. J. Snyder, 193 Erb St., W., Waterloo, Ont., Canada.

New members by baptism: three by baptism and one by confession of faith at First Mennonite, Fort Wayne, Ind.; four at North Main Street, Nappanee, Ind.; eight by baptism and one by confession of faith at Mt. Vernon, Oxford, Pa.; three at Bay Shore, Sarasota, Fla.

A. J. Metzler is serving the Oak Grove Church, West Liberty, Ohio, during November and December. His address is: R. 1, Box 21, West Liberty, Ohio 43357. Tele. 513-465-4513.

Mrs. Mae Hershey moved by train from La Junta, Colo., to Chicago, Ill., and is living with the William Hallmans at 2518 South Lawndale, Chicago, Ill. 60623. Mrs. Hershey has made a remarkable recovery from her broken hip and subsequent surgery for a hip pinning. She continues to be grateful to her many friends for their prayer support. Mrs. Hershey will celebrate her 93rd birthday on Dec. 22.

Hiroshi Kaneko writes from HCJB, Quito, Ecuador: "The Japanese Division of HCJB now has two hours daily on the air. One hour is beamed to Brazil and one hour to Japan. We receive 300 letters every month from our listeners.... Kenji was born on Oct. 11. He weighed 7 pounds 5 ounces.... We appreciate your prayers for the growth of our new son.

Marie Moyer, writing from Dhamtari, India, Oct. 24: "On Monday I leave for Nasik where I will be teaching short-story writing in the Lekhan Sansth, the writers institute, for six weeks."
Drugstore operator Kubo-san and housewives Teshiro-san and Mikami-san were baptized at Hope Mennonite Church in October in Furano, Japan. The church now has 10 members. Reiji Asai is pastor. It was a joy for Lee and Adella Kanagy, now of Ashoro, to be present for the baptism of these two former neighbor women with whom they had earlier prayed and studied the Word. Others attending the service expressed a desire to learn more about the Christian way.

Pastor Takeshi Yamada of Kyusu served most of the Hokkaido Mennonite congregations in their fall Christian Life conferences, sharing experiences of church building in southern Japan. In addition to regular activities at a central meeting place, many laymen are involved in going out to meet people—not to press them to come to church, but meeting them in the most natural situations and locations.

One hundred and eight Goshen College seniors are in student-teaching assignments in northern Indiana during the fall trimester, September-December, 1970.

The college seniors must have completed specified courses in professional education and other areas and field work assignments before they are eligible for full-day student teaching. Success in the courses and in student teaching qualifies them for teacher certification in many states.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

In the "Items and Comments" in the Oct. 6, 1970, Gospel Herald you quoted the United States Chamber of Commerce explanation of the current inflation in our country. I am sure that you do not give editorial support to the things you report in "Items and Comments" but I regard the Chamber of Commerce explanation to be such a misleading oversimplification that I feel led to write to you about it. Inflation is a serious problem in the United States (and in many other parts of the world.) We need sober consideration of the problem—not simplistic distortions. The subject is such a complex one that giving my own thoughts on the subject in this letter I may also be guilty of oversimplifying the problem. Nevertheless, here is my attempt for what it is worth.

Inflation is caused primarily because there are too many dollars trying to buy too few goods and services. When we produce (dollars) exceed the supply (available goods and services for sale) we bid up prices. What is the demand? It has three basic parts (dollars are for figures are for 1969): (1) Government purchases of goods and services—$200 billion; (2) Consumer expenditures for goods and services—$337 billion; (3) Gross private domestic investment (business man's purchases of machinery, buildings new factories, and all other capital formation)—$123 billions. But our economy did not produce $500 billion of goods and services in 1968 and so all three of us, government, private consumer, and businessman, bid up the prices of these goods and we had inflation.

The Chamber of Commerce says that the primary cause is excessive spending by the government. But why pick on the government? Private spending and consumer spending are about a half time as much as the government. Why do we expect the government to exercise the kind of restraint that we as consumers are not personally willing to exercise? This is the crux of the Chamber of Commerce's observation that the government borrowed money and incurred deficits to finance its expenditures really cast helpful light on the problem. Consumer also finance their spending by borrowing. In the last 30 years the federal government debt has increased from $50 billion to $375 billion—an increase of 7 1/2 times. But mortgage indebtedness has increased from $35 billion to $215 billion—an increase of 6 times times) and consumer credit (largely installment debt) has increased from $8 billion to $123 billion (an increase of over 15 times). Business Investment is also financed on borrowed money in many cases.

It is high time that we see that the crux of our problem is not so much how much we spend as it is "what do we spend the money for?" The Chamber of Commerce has a well-recognized bias against government spending and a bias for private spending. I think it is more helpful to look at each expenditure and to decide what government spending is good and what is bad and to decide what private spending is good and what is bad.

And now let me reveal my bias. I feel that there has been entirely too much tendency to meet the problem of large government spending by regarding defense expenditures as sacrosanct and to reduce expenditures by reducing welfare expenditures, urban renewal, pollution control, etc. Some kinds of government expenditures are very much like businessmen's investments: they are a demand on scarce goods and services when they are made but they lead to a greater production of other goods and services and thus actually help to fight inflation. But this is not true of the money that we spend to bomb our friends and our "enemies" in Vietnam or to de-foliate their crops with napalm. From an economic standpoint that expenditure is truly "operation rathole." If we are really concerned about inflation let's start by reducing expenditures, private and government, that are harmful.

The comment on Pat Boone in the Oct. 6 issue, "Preparing Parents for College," was interesting. Katie Funk Wiebe encourages understanding for young people in changing modes of music, worship, and witnessing. Then states, "I thought of this when I read recently that when actor Pat Boone leads a person to Christ, he immediately baptizes him in his backyard swimming pool."

This is an illustration of how strongly other customs cloud our thinking. Although this may seem to be a strange custom to many people, Pat Boone would fit right into the Book of Acts.

Central Argentina: Fifty Years After

By J. Delbert Erb

The Mennonite Church in Argentina has marked its fiftieth birthday. The arrival of so many friends and the reception of greetings at the anniversary conference held in Pehuajo, January 23-26, 1969, gave witness to the Spirit’s working in the heart of the Argentine Pampa. Some experienced observers noted that lay delegates from the congregations represented a new spirit of responsibility in a church that has not grown large numerically but is seeking the Spirit’s leading in defining its mission. Messages and discussions at the 1969 annual conference reflected what God has done in fifty years and anticipated the challenges of the future.

Milestones in 1969

Early in 1969 the Floyd Sieber family moved to Chocele Choel in the Rio Negro valley after being commissioned at the anniversary conference to begin mission work in that area. Most of the year was spent making contacts among neighbors and farmers in the large island near the city. People of many nationalities are settled there—Germans, Russians, Koreans, etc. In November the first public service was held in the small hall at the front of Sieber’s house. God’s message of love and reconciliation is at work. A great need remains for other Christians to migrate to Chocele Choel and help in the work of the church there.

On August 10 the former daughter congregation of the Ramos Mejia Church in Moron, a large suburb of Buenos Aires, was organized as an independent congregation. Thirteen members from Ramos Mejia living in or near Moron became charter members of the new church along with four persons who were baptized and five who were received upon confession of faith. Mario Snyder was invited to give full-time pastoral oversight, and plans were begun to establish a kindergarten on the church grounds with Mrs. Snyder as teacher.

In September 1969 the Ross Goldfus family returned to Argentina after an extended furlough and took up pastoral responsibilities in the thriving city of Salto located in the center of Argentina’s corn belt. The congregation, though small, had built its own chapel during recent years and waited for some time for someone to answer their call for a pastor. By the end of the year four persons were ready for baptism. The Spirit is at work in Salto.

After many years of dreaming and planning, the La Plata congregation has finally purchased its own building, thanks to a generous Mission Board loan and grant. Jose Palacios, the present pastor, moved into the new property on November 1 and immediately began working along with members of the congregation at remodeling both the pastoral house and two rooms which were converted into a chapel. The hours of labor donated by the La Plata brethren is a living testimony to the work of the Spirit.

Stirring of the Spirit

In 1969 a healthy restlessness prevailed in many Argentine congregations. Some were seeking to witness in suburbs of Greater Buenos Aires. In many of these places new gifts were being uncovered. Some asked how the church can better serve the community in order to meet the needs of the "whole man." In Santa Rosa and Cordoba new youth activities were planned. Bragado, Moron, and Ramos Mejia were making plans for educational facilities. Women's organizations were helping with materials for hospitals or needy homes.

In other congregations spiritual revival best characterized 1969. Congregations like Cordoba and Villa Adelina were moved by the Spirit so that their pastors, Heriberto Palomeque and Nestor Comas, came to Conference at the end of the year and told of overflowing churches and prayer meetings that lasted into the night. This partly resulted from the Spirit's work on a larger interdenominational level where pastors and laymen meet weekly for prayer and testimony. Just how these expressions of a Pentecostal experience will affect the Mennonite Church as well as most other denominations remains to be seen, but surely we can say that the Spirit is stirring.

Which Way in the Future?

How will the Spirit lead in the decade of the '70s? Challenges and calls are being heard. Some brethren are ready to respond; others are not. The future depends on the eternal truth that God calls but man must respond. Here are some specific challenges.

Bogota Evangelism Conference. Heriberto Palomeque and Dan Nuesch, our representatives to this conference, challenged us to consider the traditional methods and goals of evangelism and the needs of a continent in turmoil and revolution. As evangelicals we must have greater social concern. The Mennonite Church in Argentina has a doctrine of love and reconciliation but few outward demonstrations of that doctrine.

The need in Bolivia. Argentina is being asked to send several young people in Voluntary Service to Bolivia in cooperation with the MCC program there. John Koppenhaver, who spent a year in Argentina, visited Bolivia and is promoting this project. The next step will be direct mission work. Will there be Argentines ready to help establish a Mennonite Church among the Bolivians?

Peace and nonresistance. Agustin Darino was named Peace Secretary and is dedicating one-third time to this work. He has been asked to visit Mennonite churches and other denominations. The Federation of Evangelical Churches has named him chairman of a committee that will work on a future presentation of the conscientious objector position to the Argentine government. One youth group prepared a statement for the 1970 annual conference urging the church to make a public declaration of its position.

Radio and TV. Dan Nuesch, member of the Argentine Radio Committee, has often been used by a Buenos Aires TV station for an evening meditation. Now Dan is working with the committee and with Mennonite Broadcasts on a new five-minute radio program commenting on current problems of our society. The local church in Trenque Lauquen is offered free time on a closed circuit TV station.

Bookstore. Eduardo and Marta Alvarez of the radio correspondence office are considering an additional call to move to La Plata and set up a Christian bookstore while continuing with radio correspondence. They would attempt to serve secondary and university students as well as the local community.

Leadership. In 1969 only 14 pastors out of the 23 Argentine congregations received partial or full support from the church. (Six of these were North Americans.) Four churches were directed by pastors who came from nearby towns. Four had locally named lay pastors and three were pastored by laymen from other towns. Juan Angel Gutierrez graduated from Montevideo Seminary in November and was called by the Tres Lomas congregation. Other congregations want a supported pastor but none is available.

Where will future church leaders come from? Will the church be able to support its pastors? Will laymen be called to serve in their own congregations? Will the Montevideo Seminary supply sufficient pastors? How will the Spirit call leaders in the future? The Argentine Church is greatly concerned about these questions.

Nevertheless, we thank God that His Spirit has been working in Argentina and stirring brethren in the church. We are challenged by the many unknowns of the future. Let us all praise Him for His goodness and seek His will and guidance in our lives.

Faith—Spiritual Tranquilizer

By Doris Groff

Do you fear the results of constant rioting in the United States?

Faith in God's omnipotence rather than our own strength makes us courageous.

Do you fear attack from an enemy nation?

Looking with the eye of faith to better and lasting possessions in heaven helps us to accept our land being taken from us.

Do you fear because you know not what you may face in the future?

Have faith in God's love, as a child trusts his parents. From past experiences we can know He will not let us down.

Do you waste time worrying for fear an accident may happen to you?

Have faith in Christ. Because He had a human body Christ understands our weaknesses and prays to the Father in our behalf.

Do you fear poverty may come upon you?

In faith wait on the Lord, renew your strength, for nothing can separate you from His love.

Do you fear persecution?

When with God's help we keep faith in times of trouble, we are a shining light to guide and encourage others.
Decision

One of the great decisions facing many congregations has to do with buildings. Should we build or not? How large and what type? Should we remodel? Add classrooms and various other facilities? How should we use our resources? Should we mortgage our resources for years to come? What considerations should we face in making the right decisions? These and many more questions confront a number of our congregations today.

On the other side are questions relative to the needs for the gospel in all the world. Evangelism both at home, in the city, and the many overseas countries. What about the hunger needs, when three fourths of the world, and many people in the United States and Canada, go to bed every night hungry? Not enough nourishing food to go around. Some ministers recently decided against the use of rice at weddings because it is a basic food for large multitudes of people.

Then there is the question of education, medical services, housing, clothing, and other essential needs that are lacking for many people in all parts of the world. Many children never get to see a doctor, dentist, nor have proper drugs for their aches, pains, and sicknesses. No hospital to receive surgical treatment.

More could be written about lack of housing, inadequate clothing for winter, blankets for sleeping, nor schools to learn reading, writing, and arithmetic.

There is a 26-minute motion picture film that has been prepared to help churches make the proper decision. It tells the story of a congregation attempting to adjust their budget for home and outside use. They feel the need of an educational wing or facility. After all, they must provide for their own program. As they face up to the question with various opinions and expressed needs, they find certain principles to make the right decision.

That’s the name of the film, “Decision.” You may order it from Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Indiana 46514. After viewing the film, the congregation will need to discuss and share to allow the Holy Spirit to lead them to the right decision.

O God,
Give us eyes to see
Persons instead of color,
Possibilities instead of problems,
Christ instead of self.

By Still Waters

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free” (Jn. 8:32).

Strange, isn’t it that in the surrender of freedom, freedom is gained. Niebuhr suggests that “man is most free in the discovery that he is not free.”

In recent years man freed himself from the confines of the earth, at least for a little while. For years he longed to do just things to be free, to soar among the clouds as a bird, to walk on other planets, to step on the stars. But even as man frees himself from the small planet he does it by surrendering himself to a small capsule no larger than a prison cell. It was in his freedom to fly to the moon that he looked back and saw the small place man lives. Then man also became conscious, as never before, how bound he was to preserve life on the little planet earth. He became concerned over the pollution of earth when he had the freedom to leave earth and look back upon it.

Willie R. Frye writes, “The pianist who wishes to master his art first surrenders hours and days of freedom for the task of practice; he gives up his freedom to strike any note he wishes at random; he subjects himself to the most stringent disciplines of music. Only then is he free, gloriously free to play great music, and to play it with what seems absolute abandon.”

If we are willing to be bound by the truth of Christ and His Word only then are we really free.

Briefly Stated

In his last sermon of a series a visiting evangelist compared our gathering at the church to a huddle of a football team before the game. If we just huddle we can’t do any winning. We need to plan strategy for winning others to the Lord. He also told the congregation he was disappointed that they had not introduced him to unsaved folks in the community whom they were trying to win for the Lord. I told him I appreciated his boldness and thanked him for his frankness as I gave him good-bye on the way from the meeting. Even though I was a visitor there that day I felt I needed the message just the same. —Anna May Garber.

One With—Yet Not Partaker

Inter-Varsity Press recently released an excellent little book by Francis A. Schaeffer entitled, The Mark of the Christian. Only 35 pages, it can be read quickly. But its content will continue to stick and should be read by everyone seriously concerned about the Christian’s witness to the world.

At one point Schaeffer raises the question which strikes at the core of a good many of our recent splits: “How can we exhibit the oneness Christ commands without sharing in the other man’s mistakes?” The author then lists a few ways by which we can practice and show this oneness even across the lines where we must differ.

First, he says, “We should never come to such differences with true Christians without regret and without tears.” Rather than taking this approach we have often set out with glee to find the other’s sins. “We build ourselves up by tearing other men down.” Our spirit of disagreement displays more the love of blood rather than the love of God. Paul’s admonition in Galatians 5 to “go in the spirit of meekness” considering that we too may fall, is still good godlike advice.

Second, Schaeffer says, “in proportion to the gravity of what is wrong between true Christians, it is important consciously to exhibit a seeable love to the world.” The more serious the differences the more necessary it is that we not only speak for God’s holiness but also demonstrate to the world and each other our love for one another. The reverse is usually the case. The greater the difference the more we hate. The more serious the difference the more time is needed for prayer and Holy Spirit guidance. We often think that the more serious the difference the quicker we can cut each other off the better.

A third point is that “we must show a practical demonstration of love in the midst of the dilemma even when it is costly. . . In other words, we must do whatever must be done, at whatever cost, to show this love.” We must declare what is wrong but according to 1 Corinthians 6:1-7 we must be ready to suffer loss in a practical way rather than destroy the observable oneness of Christians.

“A fourth way we can show and exhibit love without sharing in our brother’s mistake is to approach the problem with a desire to solve it, rather than with a desire to win.” The author points out that nobody loves to win more than a theologian. What is our desire when we discuss differences? Too often we must confess our desire is to come out on top regardless. When we in love desire a solution rather than a win we make progress.

Finally, we can show a practical, observable love to the world without sharing in our brother’s mistake by realizing it is easy to compromise wrong. We usually stress this one. But it is just as necessary that we do not forget to exhibit the love of Christ. We’ve had a lot of church conferences, says Schaeffer, to point out “the principle of the practice of the purity” of the church in relation to doctrine. But have we ever had a conference to point out “the principle of the practice of an observable love and oneness among all true Christians?”

So we spend much time over the point of doctrine and forget about the pattern of love and unity by which the world knows we are Christ’s or not. One cannot expect the world to understand our doctrines or differences. One thing they can see, however, is the oneness and love of those who love Christ and each other in the face of differences.

In fact the world is better able to see our love and believe in Christ when love is present in the midst of differences than when we get in little cliques where we all think that we think and practice alike. — D.

Telling Lies to God

We are all the time telling lies to God. How? We tell Him that we are nobodies and that it is only by His mercy that we can ever be objects of His love. We are unworthy and undeserving creatures. All we are we are by His grace. But let someone say something about us and we immediately come to our self-defense. We are not to blame. We are not guilty. We are lily-white. Let someone neglect us or not recognize what we have done and we are awfully offended. Our pride is hurt.

The very fact that we are cut to the quick when someone ignores us says that we pride ourselves in being erudite. The very fact that we are hurt so easily and come to our self-defense so quickly, says that our self-opinion is all too high. The very fact that we sob in prolonged pity when someone speaks against us says that, in our minds, we are amazed that anyone finds fault in us.

But we go on lying to God. — D.
The Basis of Christian Opposition to War

By Myron S. Augsburger

What is our approach as Christians to war? This issue affects the academic community because education should confront the problems of the world. We should be responsible Christian members of our community who seek to achieve a true and lasting peace.

First, the basic premise of the early church was that Christians cannot kill men for whom Christ died. Christ has come into the world to redeem all men. We cannot rob another person of the privilege of knowing the fullness of life. Our approach to nonresistance is not negative, but positive. This is an active penetration into society with the redeeming love of Jesus Christ. When Jesus described the first and second commandments, He asked that we relate to our neighbor that which we find most important in our own relationship with Him. According to historians, the basic argument of the early church against war was that we cannot take the life of a person God purposes to redeem. Our job is to bring the meaning of Christian grace and brotherhood into his life.

For 2,000 years since Christ, in rejection of His love, men have turned to force. Now, in the modern world, God has let man discover atomic energy. It is as though He were saying, "You have put your faith in force and so I will let you see into the heart of an atom. I will let you see that the only end to this course is destruction. They that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

On the other hand, wherever Jesus Christ has been taken seriously, men have literally beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. One of the large church movements in Africa, without knowing of a 450-year-old peace church like ours, adopted the way of peace and nonviolence through simple study of the New Testament. We cannot charge the sins of society to the state when the Christian church has failed to achieve world community as a brotherhood.

Second, we regard Christ's word as final in the Scriptures. Having said that the New Testament is a culmination of God's will, it follows that Christ's word is final. He reversed the old eye-for-an-eye, tooth-for-a-tooth attitude. We should love our enemies.

Will this work in our society? Christ said that we do not have to live—we can die. The ultimate expression of this was the cross itself. In dying one may enrich the world more than by living. Of course, Christians will suffer. But how will we suffer—from that which is imposed by war (as though this will bring an end to war) or that which comes by love?

The redemptive kind of suffering comes by love. History has proved that warlike nations invariably perish. When men take the course of violence, they suffer the consequences of violence and internal breakdown in relationships. This is obvious in the image that America is creating in the world today. We are no longer looked upon as a friendly, gracious, neighborly people. We are seen in terms of power, using force to answer the world’s problems.

The third point is that we regard membership in the kingdom of Christ as our primary loyalty. This kingdom membership is more basic in our interpretation of the New Testament than is talking about love. Jesus came to introduce another kingdom. Its spirit is one of love, but its platform of operation is loyalty to the Lord. The way of peace is first of all obedience to Jesus Christ. Love follows as something one does, not just something he feels.

This promise underscores the fact that we answer first to Jesus Christ and His mandate alone. This is true with respect to any given culture or nation in which a Christian finds himself. But the Christian will seek to be a good citizen. In fact, he ought to be one of the best citizens, with the awareness that he can make many valid contributions to his nation as he gives himself to serve in a positive way.

It does not follow that if one does not participate militarily that he is not contributing to his nation. We carry an ethical responsibility to demonstrate that the position of conscientious objection to war is not something one "turns on" during a war in order to avoid two years of military service. We need a total philosophy, a way of life, that means giving one’s self in service to others.

The Anabaptists saw membership in the kingdom of...
Christ as primary. They asked, "How can I as a Christian take the life of another Christian while both of us claim to belong to the same Master and to be brothers in Christ?" One of the greatest Christian arguments for peace is the universal nature of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. A Christian of one country cannot take the life of a Christian of another country and still claim to be obeying the Lord of both. He serves his nation under Jesus Christ, not equal to or above Him.

In Romans 13 we are enjoined to respect the powers, to obey them, to be law-abiding citizens, and to support the best in our nation. But this is not stated without a basic qualification. Many Christians overlook the qualifying element and act as though this is an injunction of God to simply do whatever the powers tell us to do. Nowhere does the New Testament release us from the responsibility of making decisions that are consistent with the will of Christ.

Evangelicals have been quite free in saying that when it comes to missions and evangelism, we ought to obey God rather than man. When it comes to Christian ethics, we must do the same. In Romans 13, Paul wrote, "The powers that be are ordained of God." He meant that they are not the highest power but function below God. The question of committing oneself in ultimate loyalty to Christ means that the Christian can do no less than to act as the conscience of the society that is beneath the level of His will. As members of the kingdom of heaven, obedience to Christ is the basic aspect of our approach to the question of war.

One of the sad things about our life as a church in America is that we talk about man in the abstract and yet never love him in the concrete. We can love man across the ocean and yet not walk across the street to help a neighbor in need. We love people and not persons.

Fourth, we believe love to be the basis of Christian relationship to others. As Christians, this means that we must find the way to building bridges of understanding. We must ask about Vietnam, "What have we done to demonstrate that we can be brothers to the Vietnamese? What have we done to cultivate understanding? What can we do in this area?" The problem that we face is to discern what the course of love is, how one can express that love. Certainly, this is not simply by talking about the problem.

Young alumni of EMC have gone to Vietnam to demonstrate brotherhood, peace, and understanding through re-habilitation and aid for the suffering. We aren't simply protesters who carry a placard. Our role is not simply joining hands with others who want to raise objections. We have literally invested student lives in Vietnam. This is the kind of spirit that has to come through if we are to validate our concern for peace.

Compassion must become a part of our whole philosophy of life. Our choice of vocation, our involvements, and our service must be an expression of the love of Christ. What should be done in Vietnam, Jordan, Israel, Egypt, Nigeria, or South America? What can we do now instead of waiting until the catastrophe is upon us? If we wait, what we do will be shaped by what is already wrong.

Finally, as Christians we must behave in accordance with our belief in the sanctity of human life. Every life is of infinite worth. We treat every person as an end in himself and not as a means to an end. We are opposed to any kind of revolutionary tactics which sacrifice persons for the sake of some goal. We must also avoid the deterioration that happens to any peoples who take the course of violence as an answer to the world's ills. We cannot justly be involved in anything that interrupts man's opportunities for a full life, be it social injustice, violence, warfare, or poverty.

Most discussions on church-state relationships draw the lines vertically. They place the state on one hand and the church on the other, saying that both alike serve God. But the church operates on a higher level, on a level above the state. We respect those operating at another level, but we seek to share with them the truth of what it means to take Jesus Christ seriously.

The state is responsible, according to the New Testament, to protect the innocent and punish the evil. The Christian is not against law and order, but he knows that law does not create order. This means that Christian faith, principles, and ideals contribute more to society than the forces that seek to correct problems in a non-preventive way.

It follows in my opinion that the state has the right to protect its shores. Because of that right, it operates at a different level than the church. But there is quite a difference between protecting the shores of the state and trying to police the world. This is where our state stands under judgment even on the basis of its own criteria.

The New Testament calls the church to be the church. It asks us to give ourselves first to prayer for rulers and those in authority. Second, we are to give ourselves in sacrificial living and witnessing as an extension of the meaning of love known in the cross of Christ. We are to do what no other agency in society can do — be ambassadors for Jesus Christ.
We've Lost the Uneasy Feeling

By Katie Funk Wiebe

The chorus of voices that "a man's true life is not made up of the things he owns, no matter how rich he is" is getting louder. It is coming from both Christians and non-Christians. Who is passing this message along?

A peace research scientist. In a Canadian newspaper I read that a prominent nuclear physicist gave up his job to devote his time to scientific peace research. For nearly three years he and his wife did without a regular salary while he worked on peace research.

This meant quite a cutting back on their standard of living. They had to give up big things like a second car and full use of their home because part of it was converted into an apartment. They had to deny themselves little things like breakfast cream. Trips and unnecessary clothing were ruled out. They were willing to simplify their lifestyle for the sake of values they considered more important.

A Mennonite professor's family. After a year's sabbatical leave in the Holy Land and other countries, the "in" words for this family were "Simplify. Make Do. Do without." The family realized they needed to alter their style of life. Mrs. Miriam Sieber Lind writes in Christian Living that she thought they had lived simply heretofore, but found on their return they still had too much. To her the sin of affluence became not merely having more than one needs, but using energy deciding which dress, which pan, which table service to use which would be better used to help human beings.

Young people. The ones who hitchhiked from all over the country to attend a church convention and then housed themselves in the loft of an old hotel to protest the $18-a-day rooms at the convention center hotel.

Young people. The ones who have literally left house, car, and Samsonite luggage behind in search of another way of life. I saw them this summer along the West Coast, traveling without always knowing where they were going, a few belongings wrapped in a bedroll, a towel, or pillow case, knowing only that meaning did not lie in things.

Regardless of the way the message comes out, the meaning is the same: something happens to human values when material things control our way of life. Though the church has officially preached voluntary Christian simplicity, yet, as Orv Wiebe, counselor at Tabor College, told the faculty at their recent retreat, another message gets through. "We tell young people not to get hung up with money," he said, "yet we also tell them to make sure to have enough money to support a wife and family, to buy a house and car, to keep up the insurance, to buy braces for the children's teeth, and a flute when that time comes."

Our twentieth-century technology encourages us to keep buying and it is hard to resist. According to one writer, a modern principle seems to be that if there is a glut on the market, one must produce gluttons to get rid of it. The glut is then transferred to homes and to get rid of it here, we have the modern-day phenomena of the garage sale. People hold these sales all the time, not because they are moving, but to make room for more vases, pictures, toys, and games. Most people's houses are so overstuffed with extra items or duplicate items that one missionary on furlough commented, "If I could take back with me to South America only the cast-offs of American evangelicals, I would be a millionaire perhaps twice over."

A full closet may be one problem of affluence, but a more serious matter is that values easily get confused at such a time. Consider the example of the United Presbyterian women who gathered 4,500 strong for a convention. One of the issues they wrangled with was a program to help eradicate hunger. No specific action resulted. A special offering produced a little over $10,000 yet the women spent more than $33,000 in the conference's gift shop for jewelry, carvings, handmade clothing, and other luxury items.

The July issue of Sharing, official organ of Mennonite Mutual Aid Association, states that the bigger concern should be that a kind of independent spirit among Christians develops when affluence controls action. Independent people do not need a neighbor or a brother. Or God either. For such people, MMA, which began as a tool for brotherhood, becomes simply a "good insurance buy."

Niebuhr asks, "How can we get a gas-propelled fur-coated congregation of prosperous Americans to share the uneasy sense over possessions that is so characteristic a note of the New Testament?" How can we?
OUR TASK:
SHARING GOD'S MESSAGE

- making others his friends
- speaking for Christ
- working together with God

The U.S. Senate has denounced the findings of the Presidential Commission on Obscenity and Pornography.

Sixty-five of the Senate's 100 members voted on a resolution which rejected the recommendations of the commission's majority. The vote was 60 to 5.

The five Senators who refused to support the resolution were Jacob K. Javits of New York, George S. McGovern of South Dakota, Walter J. Mondale of Minnesota, Stephen M. Young of Ohio, and Clifford Case of New Jersey.

The unusual vote — which merely places the Senate on record as denouncing the report — followed on the heels of a report that more than 30 Republican Senators had called upon President Nixon to "disown" the report on obscenity and pornography.

One of British Methodism's leading spokesmen on moral and social affairs has urged churches to abandon a traditional Christian feature of the British way of life — the Sunday evening service.

Dr. Kenneth G. Greet, writing in a book entitled The Sunday Question, declared:

"The power of tradition is very hard to break, and many older Christians who were brought up in days when attendance at two or even three Sunday services was the order of the day find it difficult to believe that it could be right to abandon the evening service.

"It does seem sensible, however, to face the fact that there is in many places little desire for two services, and inadequate resources for maintaining a high standard of worship, both morning and evening. Where this is the case, common sense suggests that the best thing to do is to concentrate on a morning act of worship...."

In its first official report on the post civil war situation in Jordan, the United Nations said that damage in Amman and other areas was "widespread" and in other districts it was "severe.

The report was submitted by Laurence Michelmore, Commissioner General of the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) to the General Assembly.

It said that every effort is now being made to restore UNRWA services to Palestinian refugees in Jordan. After a 10-day communications blackout between the agency officials and its staff in Jordan, UN officials have reestablished contact with Jordanian government leaders, including the prime minister.

The report said Palestinian refugees were especially affected in two large camps in Amman housing some 70,000 refugees. Serious damage was also reported in camps around Amman.

There are no specific figures on the dead and wounded. Many of the refugee buildings, schools, and shelters have been destroyed.

Despite its many shortcomings, the United Nations should be commended for its success in stopping numerous brush-fire wars which, if unquenched, could have spread into "World War III several times."

This assessment of the UN performance over 25 years was made by Dr. Andrew Cordier, a former executive aide at the UN and an ordained minister of the Church of the Brethren.

The world is getting sicker, at least in the realm of movies, the London Baptist Men's Club was told by Sir John Trevelyan, secretary of the official British Board of Film Censors.

"I could not begin to describe some of the films we have to see," he said. "And I am not thinking of those which find their way into the theaters specializing in X (for adults) films, like you find in the Charing Cross Road, but of those which are being shown in private cinema clubs."

"I find myself depressed at the situation. In the words of an eminent film producer I spoke with recently, 'The world is getting sicker and sicker.'"

A decline in the number of Protestant missionaries from the North American continent has been recorded for the first time since the depression years of the 1930s, according to the ninth edition of North American Protestant Ministries Overseas Directory, published recently.

The directory, compiled for the Missionary Research Library by the Missions Advanced Research and Communication Center of World Vision International, lists 33,289 Protestant missionaries from North America in 1969, down 4 percent from the 1967 total of 34,700. The count is 15 percent above the 1959 total of 29,400.

However, American Protestants are contributing more money to overseas ministries than ever before, up 81 percent from 1959 to an estimated $345 million. This is a 9 percent increase over 1967.

Young people are "turned off" by religion because they do not "give something of themselves." This assessment of youth apathy toward religion was made by Benjamin J. Russell, new chaplain of Rosary College, a Catholic women's school.

"The whole idea of worship is giving," he pointed out. "If they come to church for entertainment, they are not going to find it unless there happens to be a great jazz combo going at it with terrific music. ... If they join in the singing just for fun, they are going to find a lot of other things that are much more fun."

The House of Deputies refused to concur with the House of Bishops' strong statement on the Vietnam war at the Episcopal Church's General Convention in Houston.

The bishops had asked U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam by December 1971 and called on the U.S. to halt supporting the Saigon government.

Refusal of the clergy and lay delegates to agree on any resolution on Vietnam means that the 63rd triennial convention wound up with no official statement on the issue.

The bishops' statement would have needed concurrence by the deputies to become the church's official voice on the matter. But time ran out before the convention could come to any acceptable compromise.

The Synod of the Waldensian Church was among groups urging the recent action of the Italian Parliament in authorizing divorce in Torre Pellice, Italy.

In a statement issued on the eve of the debate on the controversial measure, the Synod had asserted that the church has no right to impose its discipline on non-believers.

Although the gospel does not allow divorce and the church should not recognize it, the Waldensian statement said, the existence of divorce as an undeniable fact in society has to be taken into account. The Synod also said that the church should not forbid the remarriage of divorced persons, nor use divorce court documents to distinguish between "innocent" and "guilty" parties in a divorce.

The Waldensians appealed to the Roman Catholic Church to give full recognition not only to Protestant but also to civil marriages.

Originating in southern France during the 12th century, Waldensians now number about 30,000, most of them in Italy.
In 1708 a log meetinghouse was erected by the Mennonite settlers in the forest north of Philadelphia. This first meetinghouse at Germantown was replaced by the present fieldstone structure which now is the oldest Mennonite church building in North America. Its 200th anniversary was celebrated with a series of events during the days of Oct. 8-11, 1970. On Thursday and Friday, Oct. 8 and 9, the Historical and Research Committee of the Mennonite Church held its annual meeting in the Germantown church; the North American Committee for the Documentation of Free Church Origins met on Friday afternoon and evening; the Germantown Corporation convened on Saturday, and public commemorative services were held on Sunday, Oct. 11.

The Historical and Research Committee under the gifted leadership of J. C. Wenger, chairman, worked through a 28-point agenda of solid reports and presentations of concerns. The two-day gathering was opened with a meditation by Gerald Studer. The outgoing executive-secretary, Melvin Gingerich, presented his report for the period of July 1, 1969, to June 30, 1970. Gingerich’s 14-page report stands as the latest example of the conscientious work he has rendered to the brotherhood through four decades as church historian, teacher, and archivist of the Mennonite Church. On July 1 of this year Gingerich was succeeded by Leonard Gross.

Outside resource persons were invited to sit in on the meetings and report on their historical projects. James O. Lehman spoke on, “How to Proceed in the Preparation for Centennials: Reflections on Kidron.” Lee Yoder presented the plans for the Christopher Dock Bicentennial in October 1971. The Historical and Research Committee later agreed to have its 1971 annual meeting coincide with this commemoration at Lansdale, Pa. John Ruth and Jan Gleysteen reported on the so-called “Martyr’s Mirror Project,” and spoke about their hopes of communicating the Anabaptist-Mennonite heritage through the media of music, drama, slides, prints, and literature.

Brother Cornelius Krahn of North Newton, Kan., represented the General Conference Mennonite interests, the Bethel College Historical Library, and the Mennonite Encyclopedia. Krahn also reported on his recent trip through Russia.

For the evening of Thursday, Oct. 8, the Historical and Research Committee sponsored a noteworthy public program. Melvin Gingerich reminisced on “Four Decades as Mennonite Historian, Archivist, and Scholar.” Howard J. Zehr gave a well-researched presentation on “The Historical and Research Committee and the Archives in the Service of Mennonism,” spiced with a number of personal anecdotes and observations. Jan Gleysteen presented a graphic selection of 300 slides from the Martyr’s Mirror Project, a creatively novel, yet authentic moving-ahead in the quest of Christian renewal in light of history.

Featured were scenes of Anabaptist-Mennonite history from the beginnings in Switzerland to the time of settlement around Germantown. The service was concluded with some choice remarks on “The Anabaptist Vision for the 1970s” by John L. Ruth.

The North American Committee for the Documentation of Free Church Origins under the leadership of George Williams of Harvard, Franklin Littell of Temple University, and Cornelius Krahn, met in Germantown immediately following the adjournment of the H. and R. meetings on Friday, and concluded its sessions during a meal at the nearby Boswell House. This committee, generally known as NACDFCO, is projecting several series of Anabaptist and Free Church publications. It is also considering the possibility of sponsoring an annual public session, in conjunction with the American Academy of Religion Conventions.

On Saturday the Germantown Corporation convened. The Germantown Corporation is an inter-Mennonite Board established to acquire, own, and administer the church and properties on Germantown Avenue adjacent to it for the dual purpose of safeguarding the historical character of the area and to reestablish a Mennonite witness in the larger community. Already one of the hundred-year-old mansions adjacent to the church is in the process of restoration.

On Sunday morning members of the various historical committees worshipped with the local congregation and witnessed the installation of Brother Heyong Wang, a Korean graduate student in OT history, as pastor of the Germantown congregation. Ernest K. Neufeld, pastor of the Allen-town congregation and president of the Eastern District Conference, was in charge of the service, with Andrew Shelly, executive secretary of the GC Mission Board, and Gerald Studer, pastor of the Mennonite church of Scottdale, serving as witnesses.

Brother Heyong Wang currently studies at the Dropsie University in Philadelphia, and occupies with his family the first — and so far the only finished — floor of the house next to the church, owned by the corporation.

The special Bicentennial Commemorative Service was held on Sunday afternoon. A record crowd of well over 300 persons overflowed the little meetinghouse. In addition to upwards of 200 persons crowded on meetinghouse benches inside, standing in the aisles and against the wall, 74 persons were in the room behind the pulpit, and another 26 stood outside below the windows or at the door trying to hear what was going on inside. There were words of welcome and greetings, congregational singing, and special music by a quartet from the Plains Mennonite Church. J. C. Wenger delivered the main address: "The Anabaptist-Mennonite Vision 1525-1770 and Today,"... a concise and refined resume of Mennonite origins and principles. John Ruth offered the benediction.

Two hundred years have passed since the Mennonite pioneers first worshiped in the Germantown meetinghouse. A new era for the Mennonite presence and witness in Germantown is now emerging.

All-Mennonite Consultation Named PROBE '72

The all-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism scheduled for Chicago in April 1972 will be called PROBE '72, according to a recent Executive Committee decision.

"We see a number of valuable factors in the word," pointed out Henry Ginder, Executive Committee member and Director of Evangelism for Brethren in Christ churches.

"The word and symbol of which it is part speaks of the Holy Spirit probing our hearts to revival. And revival is the key to the evangelism we feel is so necessary in our world today.

"A sense of urgency alone won't get us out to do the job," Ginder explained. "It will have to be revival. We think PROBE '72 can be the spark to light a fire in Mennonites everywhere.

PROBE '72 will be a meeting of exploration not of the value and meaning of evangelism, but of how it is being done across the Mennonite brotherhood.

"We do not need to 'probe' whether it is proper for us to evangelize," declared J. B. Toews, President, Mennonite Brethren Seminary, Fresno, Calif. "The Scriptures speak most plainly. We have been charged with the Great Commission. It is simply a matter of probing our methods and means.

Not a Debate

"Nor will this be a debate on 'What Is Evangelism,'" asserts Toews. "We know what it is. We have distinctly clarified the basic theological presupositions. We do not assume, as some have, that everything a Christian does can be called evangelism.

"We are not probing for a basis," continued Toews. "We are probing into the assignment of this sacred trust in our day, and how we can carry out this assignment most effectively.

A recent Executive Committee planning session adopted a working premise for PROBE '72:

"Our belief is in the revelation of God as seen in Christ, in the authority of Scriptures interpreted through Christ, in the resurrection life experienced with Christ.

"PROBE '72 planners hope that every congregation of Mennonites will share in the Chicago meeting. A team plan has been adopted whereby several members concerned for evangelism in their home community will pull together local concerns in evangelism. The team will covenant to work together from now through 1972, and to send at least one of its members to PROBE '72.

This member will relate local concerns and experiences to the consultation and report to his team the ideas and inspiration received from PROBE '72. The team will then work to share their renewal with the congregation and community.

Further information is available from Eugene Witmer, Executive Secretary, PROBE '72, Box 127, New Holland, Pa. 17537.

New College-Age Publication to Appear

A news-forum publication on behalf of Mennonite university and college students will appear in November. The planned monthly is intended to more fully meet the ideal of a forum which had been anticipated but only partially realized in the former experimental student publication, Arena. John Rempel, editor of Arena during its two-year existence, will initially act as editor of the news-forum. News-forum sponsors are the Student Service Committees of the General Conference Mennonite and the (Old) Mennonite churches.

Format and publication schedule of the new publication, which will appear monthly throughout the academic year, has been changed to better facilitate feedback and discussion. Response to current articles will be possible up to one week before publication of the consecutive monthly issue.

Students from both of the sponsoring Mennonite conferences will have a chance to indicate whether they wish to receive the publication. The forum will provide for conversation among Mennonite students (and faculty members) on campuses and among groups and individuals on campus and interested members of the brotherhood in other settings. The news-forum will be a medium of communication for brothers in the various settings of the church.

As an experimental venture Arena was open to change and revision. The Student Service Committees (General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, and Mennonite Church) acted to discontinue the publication in the spring of 1970.

Neither editor nor sponsors agreed with every idea expressed, yet they were willing to provide an avenue for discussion through which it was hoped would emerge greater understanding and appreciation for fellow students and fellow church members. Almost all of the content reflected concern for the church, the church's mission in the world, and the church's relevancy and witness.

With the demise of Arena the forum for saying the things which needed to be said wanted a publication. The news-forum will attempt to carry on from where Arena left off.

Lilly Funds GC
Study Center

Lilly Endowment, Inc., an Indianapolis-based foundation, announced a three-year grant of $75,000 to Goshen College today for special research into the means of strengthening religious and moral values held by students.

The Center will enlarge and advance the work already begun. Among its goals are:

1. A serious study of the distinctive role of Christian colleges in America today and how they can continue as significant institutions of higher education.

2. A current theory of Christian higher education that includes the importance of influencing students' moral and religious values, as well as their intellectual growth.

3. A program of experiments and activities that develops Christian character in college students; is faithful to the Christian heritage, is true to the best in the liberal arts tradition, prepares young persons to take part in contemporary affairs, and uses the findings of the behavioral sciences and modern Christian educational theory.

4. A service to both Christian and secular colleges which are interested in attaining similar goals.

Heston Interterm
Goes to Israel

An attractive feature of the Heston College interterm is that it gives student educational experience off campus. In fact, with jet air travel available today, almost any place in the world becomes accessible.

To help students get a better understanding of the message of the Bible, a biblical studies pilgrimage to Bible lands is planned. Educational objectives will be achieved through studies in biblical backgrounds and a ten-day trip to Israel and Rome.

The trip is scheduled for Jan. 12-21, 1971. The fee for the course will be $550 plus transportation costs to New York.

This educational tour is still open to persons who want a travel-educational experience.

Persons may be on the pilgrimage without taking the course for credit. Such persons are welcome to attend the orientation class periods Jan. 4-11. There will be supplementary lectures and class discussion before and following the trip. Persons going on the pilgrimage will be asked to read required texts.

The course will include three areas: historical geography of Bible lands, biblical archaeology, and the current Middle East crisis.

Aims and objectives for the course are: (1) to gain an overall grasp of biblical history and geography of Bible lands, (2) to understand how the archaeologist works and the contributions of archaeology to our understanding of the Bible, (3) to show how an understanding of biblical backgrounds is necessary for a right interpretation of the Bible, and (4) to understand the issues in the current Middle East crisis.

Those planning to participate in the Bible lands tour should begin the process of securing passports and meeting health requirements immediately.

All applications should be in by Dec. 12. Cancellation is possible up to four weeks before departure with full refund.

Arrangements for the trip are being made by Menno Travel Service, Newton, Kan. Applications for membership should be made to Clayton Beyler, Hesston College, Hesston, Kan. 67062.

FIELD NOTES

An Inter-Mennonite School for Ministers will be held in connection with Goshen Biblical Seminary from Jan. 13-21, 1971. Registration fee is $10. A variety of classes helpful to the pastor and Christian worker will be offered. Wives may participate. More information may be obtained from the Registrar, Goshen Biblical Seminary, 3003 Benham Ave., Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

An Inter-Term will be held for the first time this year at Goshen Biblical Seminary from Jan. 4-22, 1971. There will be a variety of courses offered both on and off campus. A brochure may be obtained by writing the Registrar, Goshen Biblical Seminary, 3003 Benham Ave., Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Goshen Seminary students who participated in the Urban Ministries Program for Seminarians in Chicago last summer report that possibly the greatest challenge the church faces today is the challenge of the inner city.

James Hess, Eastern Board missionary on furlough, made an administrative visit to Honduras, British Honduras, and Guatemala, Oct. 14-28. He was representing Harold Stauffer, Eastern Board's Associate Secretary of Overseas Missions.

In Honduras, Hess met with the General Council of the Honduras Mennonite Church. The General Council approved their Executive Committee's recommendation to move the Honduras Mennonite Bible Institute from Trujillo to La Ceiba.

The Mennonite Medical Board at the Nazareth (Ethiopia) Hospital changed its name to the Meserete Kristos and Mennonite Medical Board at its annual meeting held on Oct. 17, Nazareth Hospital, begun by Eastern Board missionaries, is administered by the medical board composed of missionaries and Ethiopians.

The name change comes as another step toward transferring the hospital's administration from missionaries to the Ethiopians.

Howard O. Jones of the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association will be the main speaker for Ministers' Week at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., Jan. 25-29, 1971.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

This registers a modicum of disapproval at the appearance of some of our younger members pictured in the Gospel Herald's columns: their long hair and other looks seem to tell the world, "I belong." — B. Lloyd Winger, Broomall, Pa.

Thanks for the article on abortion by Lewis B. Smedes. I'd urge the printing of more articles on problems young parents face today — overpopulation, birth control, more on abortion, the Christian's response: and the joy of adoption and foster care of neglected children from minority races, older children and this is due to the fact that they have physical and mental handicaps.

Two of our four sons came into our home by birth, and two are adopted, of Mexican descent. Our problems and joys are not unusual, but with added dimension. We can never thank God enough for allowing us to be instrumental in rescuing these boys from malnutrition, neglect, violence, and deprivation.

We'd like to see Gospel Herald challenge other Christian families to accept children in need, rather than simply adding to overpopulation.

—L. (Mrs. Lu) Yoder, Archbold, Ohio.

Praise God! I just received the Nov. 3 issue of Gospel Herald. Thanks for a spiritual feast.

"Am I to 'The Church Building — A Mission Or an End'?" My husband and I have felt this is the "real" way ever since we became involved in the Spanish ministry.

"Me Be Grateful?!" and "In Remembrance of Me." Very good questions and I didn't agree more with "The High Price of TV." Our Volkswagen customers frequently, on meeting our children, remark that they are very interesting people and go on to follow. They have lived without TV. (We do rent one for events such as the moon flights.) We have supplied them with such things as develop their minds, talents, and allow for exploration and inventions.

The articles by Albert Zehr and Lewis B. Smedes were appreciated very much also. Thanks again for such a wonderful issue of Gospel Herald. — Mrs. Leslie, Lancaster, Pa.

With thanksgiving I read the article, "Is the Congregation Central?" by Paul N. Kraybill in the Sept. 22 Gospel Herald. It is encouraging to see the emphasis shifting back to the importance of the local congregation. Our prayers are being answered. — Kenneth J. Smoker, Columbus, Kan.

After reading Conrad Brunk's article, "Needed: A New Nonconformity" in the Oct. 20 Gospel Herald, I need to ask if Bro. Conrad Brunk ever realized or appreciated the value of the "total" nonconformity that the Mennonite Church has tried to practice in the past and is still practicing in many areas.

Nonconformity was not mere outward appearance, but a real, genuine witnessing way of life. Many of the former generation were evangelical, even though attired in what Bro. Brunk calls a peculiar breed of dress. A look into early Mennonite and Brethren literature will verify this statement. A conformity to American style is not necessary to become the "noisy in the land." Perhaps Bro. Brunk is not aware that there are many congregations across our land today that are very evangelical and are attempting to practice nonconformity in all areas of living and are developing thriving congregations in both numbers and in spirit. Perhaps a new understanding of the old is needed more than a new nonconformity that is merely an attempt to fit into a culture around us. — Lewis M. Coss, Hagertytown, Md.

Regarding Bro. Carl Kreider's address, "Dissent Is Topic for GC's Kreider," (G.H. 10/27/70) I would like to give the following response.

As a Mennonite I have been greatly concerned that we rise to the challenges of a revolutionary world in upheaval torn by strife. But so far I have not been entirely satisfied with the prescriptions given by Mennonite writers that (I have read) who advocate revolutionary approaches. Their position seems to be biblically inadequate and anti-Christian. But, I feel that Carl Kreider's Goshen College address seems entirely scriptural. It is the shortest, clearest, biblical position I have seen on meeting the total needs of a child. I believe that he will be published as a tracery and distributed by the Children's Bible Society because we Mennonites do have a transforming message of reconciliation and wholeness for the world.

— Joseph F. Baer, Marilla, N.Y.

Thank you for publishing the baccalaureate address of Conrad G. Brunk at EMC. It is refreshing to read an article which points out concerns which I have had for a long time regarding nonconformity and nonresistance. — Ira B. Sollenberger, Dillsburg, Pa.

I would like to extend warm support for the views expressed in your editorial "An Old-New Method" in the Nov. 3 Gospel Herald. It has been my conviction for some time that meeting in homes would be an important first step in renewal of the church. It would be an opportunity for more personal participation in worship and study. I opposed the present preoccupation with going to church and having church, the focus could well be on being the church rather than going to church.

Each house-church could ask: What does it mean for us to be the people of God in our community? What does it mean to be the church? What does it mean to follow Jesus in life? How can we be a loving community? These questions, if faced honestly, could lead to a whole new style of life. We could rediscover the vision of our Anabaptist fathers.

Granted, it's not all that simple. The training of lay leaders would be a prime task. But it seems to me that Christian house-churches who are radically obedient to Jesus as Lord in life will be the church of the future.

— Jim Helmuth, Richmond, Ind.

I have been subscribing to Gospel Herald since the early 1940s, I have always enjoyed reading the paper. My wife called my attention to your wonderful editorial (October 27) entitled "Past Due. Both my wife and I were thrilled with what you had to say.

One can only dream at what the results would be if families, pastors, congregations, and groups within the congregations would take your advice seriously. Now is the time! Many church hearts such as they never dreamed is available. The released money would not only bring abundant life to the giver, but the degree of good which would be released in the world can hardly be imagined. This is the time that we need to be the church, that our testimony would be taken far more seriously than it is today because it would be more evident that we are trying to do what we can in a scriptural and positive way.

During the past years I have seen many lives, and families, liberated when they began to take the Lord seriously in regard to the use of material goods. Satan would like to convince us that to be a good steward means a crippling of life. Just the opposite is true: it means a liberation of life. Yesterday I noticed that it costs $1.36 to buy the same amount of goods as one could buy for $1.00 in 1957. Yet, this does not present the total picture because a Christian need not follow the herd-mind and worldly standards. Also, when one considers the fantastic increase in income of our people during these thirteen years one can simply dream about the potential in all that we are withholding of money.

Many years ago a teacher of mine told me that pastors ought to major on preaching from the Bible. His point was that in this way the pastor will automatically treat the major root questions facing us today. The pastor who will search the Scriptures will discover that he will need to preach on nonresistance. He will need to preach on the evils of beverage alcohol. (Thirty-three out of the sixty-six books of the Bible speak strongly on this point.) And, the pastor will discover that he will need to preach forthrightly on the Christian and the use of his money.

With all the emphasis on issues and problems today, should we not also praise the Lord that we live in a country where our government actually gives us "a tax break" as we give to causes that are nearest to the heart of God. Is it not fantastic that this year we can deduct up to 50 percent for charitable purposes? Many in our brotherhood should be giving in these amounts. However, I would like to quickly state that our norm for giving is not a government.

But, at a time when we are concerned about certain uses of our tax dollar, it would seem that our first consideration would be to reduce that tax dollar to the lowest possible point.

Thank you again for your excellent editorial.

I plan to use it and refer to it in my continuous travels among our churches. — Andrew R. Shelly, Newton, Kan.

Let's Quit Trying to Salt the Earth!

By Glendon L. Blosser

Preserving meat with salt is a process that really works. A ham on butcher day can be rubbed with a couple handfuls of salt, with a few other ingredients for flavor, and you can have it as a delicious treat for the family a year later. The salt has a power for cellular infiltration that permeates and preserves the whole ham.

A memory I have of butchering days at home is my father’s urgency in getting the meat cured. Especially the year after a neighbor discovered his hams had spoiled. The salt cure was put on too late to stop decomposition. Either the process of preservation or the process of deterioration will be at work. Both cannot operate at the same time. Salt may retard the decaying action, but salt has never made a rotten ham a good ham.

Jesus in His teachings in the Sermon on the Mount gave us these two illustrations, “You are like salt for all mankind” and “You are like light for the whole world” (TEV). Both of these metaphors suggest the character of the Christian is different in nature from the world, which is corrupt and dark. Many scriptural passages describe the decadence of unregenerate society. Prevailing environmental conditions document it every day. A teacher in geography class had this same idea reinforced one day when she asked her pupils, “What is the shape of the earth?” “My father,” volunteered one small boy, “says the earth is in the worst shape it has ever been in. It is a mess.”

Let’s quit trying to salt the earth. We have abused this verse long enough and it is poor hermeneutics and incorrect reasoning to continue to say our ministry of reconciliation is to salt the earth. Regardless of the amount, salt cannot preserve corrupt meat and change it into a palatable meal. Salt cannot flavor spoiled food. The putrefying stench of a rotten egg can never be sweetened by salt to make it a delight for the morning breakfast.

The first twelve verses of Christ’s great sermon describes the character needed of His followers to be reconcilers in the world. Matthew 5:13-16 then explains the process of the ministry of reconciliation. In this passage three basic principles are set forth in a meaningful order. They need to be understood and practiced that we might be effective agents of reconciliation.

The Christian’s Character Must Be Preserved

The first basic principle is that the Christian’s character must be preserved. Verse 13 is not by any manner of interpretation suggesting a preservation of the earth. The illustration of salt is not used to explain what salt does to the world but what the world does to salt. It is salt that needs preservation not a corrupt world. The world needs a transformation not a preservation. Scriptures suggest the inevitable devastation of the earth rather than an instigated utopianism. Hence the nature of salt makes it an invalid illustration of the Christian’s duty in the world.

Christ used the illustration of salt three times in His teachings (Matthew 5:13; Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34, 35). In all three instances He uses salt to warn of the possibility of becoming insipid. Salt can lose its saltiness and become useless. In Jesus’ day the problem of getting salt mixed with earth or exposed to the rain and sun was more common. It made an excellent illustration to pinpoint the danger that Christian character can be lost and become worthless.

It is the quality of the substance in the saltshaker that makes it desirable not the quantity or the name of the contents. It is possible to put too much emphasis on the shaking and the shaker and have tasteless salt. The world can detect a phony Christianity. If in all of our “shaking” we are giving forth an insipid faith, our actions will be tossed aside and trampled upon.

Christ had this same burden on His heart in His priestly prayer. “I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world” (Jn. 17:15, 16). The preservation of the Christian needs to be achieved by insulation rather than by isolation. The Christ-like character cannot be taken for granted. There must be those conscious and willful refusals that the elements of materialism and secularism do not degrade the crystal graces of a redeemed life.

“Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another,” were the words Jesus used when He ended His teaching on self-discipline in Mark chapter nine. We must be “salted” or pride and self-indulgence will destroy the character that brings meaning into human relationships. Nothing is so insipid and worthless as a Christian who has lost the qualities of a pure and holy love. Nothing can compensate for the loss. The Christian character that Jesus said would do greater works than He will be trodden under the foot of men.

The Christian's Influence Will Be Perceived

After Jesus used the appropriate salt illustration to show the importance of preserving the Christian's character, then He used light to explain the second basic principle. The Christian's influence will be perceived. When light is present its existence is not questioned. It has the kind of penetration that changes the very nature of the surrounding environment.

The text declares that the illuminating nature of the true Christian cannot be hid. It is inherent for light to shine and chase away darkness. The transformed life of the child of God is not for isolation under a bushel. It is even out of question to consider hiding a city set on the hill. The brilliance of the Christlike life is for everyone to see. When the first principle is observed that the quality of character is preserved then it is unavoidable that the influence will be perceived.

The very nature of light makes it a source of attraction, but it is not to show off the lampstand or the candlestick. We are the fixtures through which the world perceives the radiance of the gospel. Since Jesus is the light of the world, we can transmit from an inexhaustible source.

A lighthouse has an undefined boundary of perception. The Christian beacon silently sends rays and guides the wayfarers safely home. Often this may be unnoticed, since the scope of the influence is undetermined. At my invitation a 60-year-old man accepted Christ in the hospital. Not knowing the former life of the patient and somewhat surprised he had responded so readily, I asked him, "What influenced you the most in giving you a desire to be a Christian?" His face glowed as he replied, "I have been a plasterer all my life and whenever I would work in the homes of Christian people, their lives impressed me."

The ministry of reconciliation requires us to be truly luminaries. The man of the street is tired seeing the erection and decoration of lampposts. It is the glow of a life that has meaning and purpose that attracts and brightens the passerby. Life needs the kind of demonstration that shows that being is more important than doing; that a transformed nature excels a reformed conduct.

It is an imperative that we keep our globes clean from the smut of selfishness and sensuousness. Paul warns us, "Stop having anything to do with the profitless doings of darkness; instead you must continue to expose them . . . anything that is exposed by the light is made clear to them, for anything that is made clear is light" (Eph. 5:11-13, Williams). The light the Christian radiates is for the redemption of the world rather than its rejection. We are to be the light of the world because when light is perceived it transforms the very nature of the darkness.

The Christian's Works Should Be Prescribed

An effective agent of reconciliation will observe the third principle which suggests the Christian's works should be prescribed. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Mt. 5:16). This verse makes it an imperative that the Christian does good works. All that has been said prior to this about the need for a good solid character does not indicate the unimportance of a prescribed pattern of good works.

The caution mentioned is that the good works are not for the exaltation of self but for the glorification of God. We need to be sure our good works are saying the right things to the world. Whose program are they advertising? Ours or God's?

Our good works need to be prescribed so that they are useful for God rather than for our usefulness. Jesus gave us this example. "My Father is still working, and so am I. . . . The Son can do nothing by Himself, except as He sees the Father doing it, for whatever the Father is in the habit of doing the Son also persists in doing" (Jn. 5:17, 19 Williams). Another time Jesus said, "Yes, He who sent me is ever with me; I am not alone, because I always practice what pleases Him." Our works are to be an expression of our Father's will. Life becomes exciting when our works can be seen as divine activity rather than Christianized vivacity.

The ministry of reconciliation's effectiveness rests upon the ability of the agents of reconciliation to prescribe their good works to the will of the redeeming God. This requires a life filled with the presence and power of the Holy Spirit. A program of reconciliation that is devoid of the discernment and direction of the Spirit is purely social action.

Social action programs will continue to try to salt the earth and reform it as a better place to live. Meanwhile the true agents of reconciliation will let their good works shine, that lives can be transformed and live in a "better place."

Response on Adult Education

Paul M. Lederach, director of the Congregational Literature Division at the Mennonite Publishing House, answered a letter concerning congregational education. He shared a copy of his letter with me. With his permission, here it is with some adaptations.

Dear Mrs. ———:

If I interpreted your letter correctly, you are raising fundamental questions about the Christian educational enterprise in Mennonite congregations — questions I wish everyone were asking.

You were picking up the issue of the nature of adult education in our congregations. You noted your own frustration having prepared for class and others did not. You raised the question about classes formed around topics of choice and suggested the need for studies in areas other than the traditional direct Bible study. . . .

Personally, I feel that congregations have treated adults too much like children. Adults are put in classes according to age. They are handed a curriculum to study. As a consequence there is little sense of progress, of accomplishment, or of doing something significant. Too often, we overlook the fact that adults enter an educational program not for future preparation but for help right now! Therefore, adults should be involved in choosing what is studied. The study process also should involve the wide experience of adults, and should focus on current problems.

I agree with you that adults should be able to decide to leave the Uniform Series from time to time, to pick up special issues for study, and to form classes around these issues. As a publisher we could hardly publish books for all areas of interest. We already have many books that would provide a base for such classes. We have books on Mennonite history, on nonresistance, and on the Christian life. I'm sure your Provident Bookstore could show you what is available from us and also from other publishers. . . .

Thank you for writing. We are always ready to discuss such issues and are eager to learn from our congregations how we can do a better job.

“Ye are all one in Christ Jesus” (Gal. 3:28).

Before the battle of Trafalgar, the famous Lord Nelson came upon two of his leading officers. They were quarreling so violently that they did not notice the approach of their admiral. He listened for a moment, then breaking in, he said with cutting severity, “Gentlemen, I don't know what is in dispute. This I know: There is only one enemy. Our fight is with him.”

John Wilkes was a popular preacher in England. Many people became his followers, calling themselves Wilkites. In their enthusiasm they got out of hand and went wild in fanaticism. John Wilkes had to explain to George III that as for him he was not a Wilkite.

Could it be that Jesus does not want to identify Himself, in the way we want Him to, with any of our sects and divisions? Christ stands outside, above lamenting over them all and prays that we may be one. Christian brotherhood depends on a life in the Spirit of Christ, freed from all hatred and prejudice and filled with a love and active good will which causes a world to say, “Such are Christ's disciples.” Only in Christ can people really be one. Our common faith in Christ brings unity.

Briefly Stated

In a rural community a committee was soliciting men to go to a section of a large city to clean up the yards and streets. Some busy farmers wondered what good that would do as there were strong able-bodied men with more leisure time than they, living there. The city folk could be insulted. A better way to help might be to work with the people, to talk with them, to help them to become acquainted with a better way of life and create a desire to change. They will have more self-respect if they bring about a change themselves, and be more apt to keep clean and neat.

Too often we think of things instead of people. That dilapidated house or untidy yard grates on our nerves because of our thrifty ways. If we could think first of the people who live there and if we loved them enough, we might be able to learn to know them and have an exchange of ideas. They might even come to know our Lord and His saving grace, if they saw the fruits of the Spirit in us, and clean up inside. Then the outside will likely follow in the cleaning process. — Anna May Garber.

Toys and Violence

I read an article in the local newspaper entitled: "Attacks on Teachers." It was disturbing. As I read of the 1,085 assaults on teachers in Chicago last year and that 760 were by children in the first six grades, I asked myself: Is there a relationship between their toys and their actions?

With Christmas approaching parents will be buying toys in abundance. The type of toys a child plays with can do much to shape his personality and behavior. According to Dr. Jerome D. Frank of Johns Hopkins University, research has shown that the mere sight of a gun will increase violent behavior. Children who play with toy guns are more likely to destroy the work of a playmate than children who play with nonwar toys.

The more children play with toys of violence the more aggressive they are in life. The gun murder rate is two or three times higher in states where gun laws are lenient than in states with strict rules. Aggression can be good but not when it becomes destructive.

Consider the testimony of an ex-soldier to Vietnam: "I'm a 20-year-old ex-marine Vietnam veteran. It took me only one day of actual combat from behind my machine gun to find that something just wasn't right. Killing wasn't fun. I found that when somebody is shot he doesn't grab his stomach, spin around, die, and get back up only to do it all over again because it was fun. I learned that when rockets and mortars and bombs fall and go off they tear people into chunks of bloody flesh, some of it still breathing. I'm not married but when I do get married and have all the kids I'll have, you can bet that not one of them will have a Matty Mattel rifle or a GI Joe Doll nor see a John Wayne soldier movie."

One way we as parents can discourage violence is to keep guns and war toys out of the environment of children. By giving our children toys of peace instead of war we show them that we disapprove of violence. We discourage them from resorting to violence by providing creative toys. When they are adults they will be more likely to search for non-violent ways of resolving conflicts. For the sake of the future of our society and our world I encourage every parent to resist the pleas of their children to purchase toys of war this Christmas. — Written by Pastor David Eshleman, Flanagan, Ill., and printed in five newspapers.

Keeping It Straight

W. T. Purkiser, editor of Herald of Holiness, recently shared a comment of a member of the church who said, "All my life preachers have been telling me to lay up treasures in heaven, but none ever told me how to do it. I had to figure it out for myself.

"If I'm going to lay up treasures in heaven, I cannot invest them in farms, or cattle, oil, or things that are not going to heaven. I must invest them in things that are going to heaven — boys, girls, men, and women."

We must keep it straight. We put up treasure in heaven by using it to help persons. Our selfish society seeks to squeeze us into its mold which is contrary to Christ's call. The world allows us a nodd toward God in our giving but says invest in things and more things to make more and more money. And often those who are most secure materially are pressured by the world spirit into trying to make themselves more and more secure by more and more insurance and investments in things.

The Christmas Sharing Fund was created a number of years ago to help keep us all conscious of the true meaning of Christmas. It is a call to share beyond our own family and friends. It has been a growing thing. This is great. Yet compared to the great amount spent on ourselves, over the Christmas season, for things we really don't need, the amount given seems small, very small.

This year the committee on coordination of church program has planned again for the Christmas Sharing Fund appeal. Each family of the church is asked to give $10 as a special Christmas gift to the Christmas Sharing Fund. The money will be distributed, as in past years between the Mission Board, Mennonite General Conference, and the Mennonite Board of Education. All three agencies are in real need for funds to carry out the work assigned by the church. What you give will be an investment in boys and girls, men and women. In this issue is a coupon for you to cut out, fill in and mail. — D.
Preparing for Christmas

By Ella May Miller

A display of the true Christmas spirit, not a "plush" Christmas, makes the event meaningful. Especially for children. They don't understand Christmas as we adults do, to be sure. They can't interpret the true message of peace and pardon that Jesus Christ brought to mankind. But making Christmas a very special holiday impresses on their minds its importance. This does much to foster a reverence and a true interpretation later, in their mature years.

True Meaning

There should be family participation. Christmas is one big event of the year where family togetherness is a natural. Each decoration, each activity should be full of meaning, and in keeping with the spirit of that first Christmas. With this approach you'll be more selective, do less, and will enjoy it more. Be less tired, too!

What children remember in later life is the "doing together." They remember the attitudes, the meaning which you conveyed through the preparations, decorations, giving, and actual participation. These attitudes and meanings they "catch" from you as parents.

I believe gift giving can be a very meaningful part of the festivities, if it's sincere, spontaneous, and kept within one's budget. Costly giving is wrong if it's merely a duty. And surely horror toys and war toys hardly belong to the spirit of that first Christmas. Neither does impersonalized giving, such as gift certificates.

Element of Surprise

And I'm beginning to develop a philosophy that the gift should not be chosen from a long list of wants. I say this because giving should contain an element of surprise. Wasn't this true of that first Christmas? Christ's coming to earth was a surprise! And what a joyful surprise to those who loved God!

In the same way, it seems to me, the gifts you give to those you love should contain surprise. This requires that you know the individual's personality, and what he or she enjoys in life. Then choose your gift accordingly.

This fact was impressed upon me several years ago. An elderly Cuban refugee lady lived in our community. She had left behind her wealth, a lovely home, and all that she possessed. So at Christmas time I debated whether or not to buy her practical gifts such as food, clothing, kitchen utensils, etc. However, knowing that in her Cuban home she had enjoyed such luxuries as jewelry, perfumes, fineries, and fragrant incense, I finally bought her an incense burner and cones, along with a few practical gifts. And I'm not exaggerating when I tell you that the gift of incense brought the tears, the hugs, and the many expressions of gratitude from her. Not only on Christmas Day, but many times during the following weeks and months she mentioned the incense, and the fond memories it brought back to her mind.

I was convinced I had not "wasted" my money!

The Thrill of Expectancy

Years ago, the aura of surprise and mystery was just a part of Christmas, wasn't it? Parents came home, arms bulging with packages which were quickly whisked away into secret storage. The children guessed. They peeked. They begged. They slept anxiously. But to no avail. Only upon opening the gifts at Christmas was the spell of mystery and surprise broken.

I honestly believe our children miss something very important and vital when we deny them the thrill, the joy of expectancy! (And this holds for all the time, not only at Christmas.) In fact, they become demanding, and don't even appreciate the abundance of things they receive, if they make all the suggestions.

Spirit of God's Giving

Sharing and giving should be patterned after the spirit of God's giving.

There are many who still celebrate in this spirit, like Dan Visson (known as Uncle Dan) of Oklahoma City.

For several Christmas seasons this aged philanthropist gave millions of gifts to children of convicts, and to those who otherwise wouldn't have any toys.

More recently he started preparing Christmas gifts for only 500 children . . . because he now has a new camp for children on 320 acres of beautiful virgin timberland.

Uncle Dan entertains only those children who haven’t had anything, and those who might have encounters with the law.

To me Uncle Dan’s spirit of giving is akin to that of God’s giving . . . no strings attached . . . sacrificial . . . prompted by love in response to human need . . . which lasts on beyond one special day.

Guidelines

Now, in somewhat of a summary I’m giving these guidelines for your Christmas preparations:

1) Think first of others. As a family give to underprivileged or homeless children in your community. Give a homemade gift of fruitcake, candy, cookies, or jelly festively wrapped and decorated to some lonely, rejected, or aged person. Maybe even invite them to your home.

2) Shop early so you won’t be too tired when the day arrives. This requires both parents and children to plan ahead. It also allows time for making gifts.

3) Mail packages early for the benefit of all concerned. Get your cards out early and enclose a personal message. This keeps card-sending from becoming commercialized.

4) Don’t bypass the old-fashioned decorations: a manger scene — made from clay or painted by the artist in your family . . . A Christmas star, red and green crepe paper streamers, bells, wreaths, and decorative greens arranged in the rooms. Green, you know, symbolizes “life.” Go to the woods as a family and select what you like. Use noncombustible materials as much as possible.

5) Emphasize the religious significance of the season, in both decorations and celebrations. Prepare carols, poems, and a short drama as a family. Play Christmas records. Read and discuss the biblical account of Christ’s coming to earth — His purpose, and His position.

6) Attend religious services together. Don’t let shopping, decorating, and parties keep you from this. If you do, I fear you’ve missed the true spirit of Christmas.

7) Help your children guard against greed. “The gift without the giver is bare” so teach them the joy of giving, of putting themselves into the gifts. Then they won’t be so apt to concentrate on getting the most, or the biggest gifts.

8) Do something especially nice for someone who can’t return it. One day, when a small boy, Norman Vincent Peale and his father were laden with Christmas purchases. As they walked along the sidewalk, an unshaven, bleary-eyed man, begging pennies, touched Norman. The boy jerked away. His father saw it, reprimanded him for his disrespect to one of God’s creatures, then gave the lad a dollar to give to the old man . . . “in the name of Christ.”

Encourage your teenagers to entertain neglected young persons or to participate in a service project.

9) Spend wisely so as not to be burdened with debts. Give within your economic limits — not to outdo another.

10) Make your biggest gift to Him whose birthday we celebrate. Of course this gift will be you, yourself. Give your mind, your voice, your hands, your feet to Him. Allow Him to direct all your activities and celebrations. You also give to Him by giving to missions, to worthy causes, to the rejected and needy.

Christmas is worthy of celebrating. It should loom large in your child’s mind as an important event! He won’t understand all it means . . . but if celebrated in God’s spirit of love, sacrifice, sharing and giving you lay the foundation of faith in his mature years.

And don’t let the Christmas spirit die after the 25th. “The Christmas spirit that goes out with the dried-up Christmas tree is just as worthless.”

"Ready for Christmas!” she said with a sigh
As she gave a last touch to the gifts piled high . . .
The house all clean, decorated and gay,
When she heard a voice from far away:

"Ready for Christmas, when only last week
You wouldn’t acknowledge your friend on the street?"

"Ready for Christmas, while holding a grudge?
Perhaps you had better let God be the judge.

"Ready for Christmas, when only today
A beggar lad came and you turned him away?

"Ready for Christmas! You’ve worked, it is true.
But doing the things that you wanted to do."

"Oh, Father, forgive me, I see what You mean, Ready means more than gifts and a house swept clean!"

Yes, more than the giving of gifts and a tree,
It’s the heart swept clean that He wants to see.

A heart that is free from bitterness — sin
Ready for Christmas — and ready for Him!

A New Look at Christmas

My Christmas Day last year was spent in a nursing home, not as an elderly patient, but as a visitor. Turning down several other invitations, I decided to spend the day with Mother at Schowalter Villa, where we had taken her in September after she had reached the stage where we could no longer care for her at home.

Less for Mother’s sake than for my own, I shall always be glad I did. She scarcely realized that I was there, but the experience gave me a new look at Christmas.

Mother’s roommate was a 65-year-old woman whose left side was paralyzed from a series of strokes. She could not talk, but during the months I had known her, we had learned to communicate quite well with each other. She had gained ground steadily, but a few days before Christmas she had another stroke, so that on Christmas Day she lay in a coma, oblivious to all around her.

Her daughter and son came to express their love, as they had done many times and in many ways while their mother could still comprehend. And all through the day the nurse and the aides slipped into the room to change Mrs. Brewer’s position, coax her to swallow some liquids, and to otherwise minister lovingly to her needs.

At noon I ate in the Villa dining room with Elma, whom I had known since college days. She has been blind for years, and had fallen the year before and broken her hip. There had been other complications, and I knew that she was in constant pain. But she was a gracious hostess, and the conversation at the table was light and spirited.

The gentleman who sat at the head of the table had lost the use of his legs, but there was nothing wrong with his mind or his sense of humor.

“ ‘These are special,’ ” he told us confidentially as he passed the cranberry jelly stars. His brown eyes twinkled. “The astronauts brought them back from the moon.”

I had learned to know Ina when I visited the Villa Sunday school class. One morning she recited from memory the entire verse from Thanatopsis which begins, “So live that when thy summons comes to go—.” The firm conviction with which she said the lines, the quiet confidence of her voice, the serenity of her whole being, all testified to the fact that she had “so lived.”

In the afternoon, while Mother slept, I sat by the open door, looking at Christmas cards and enjoying the visitors that came and went in the room across the hall. A daughter came, and some sons, but mostly it was the grandchildren, bringing the great-grandchildren to show their Christmas presents and recite their Sunday school verses to Grandma.

Suddenly it was late afternoon, time to awaken Mother and feed her the evening meal. My Christmas Day was over.

The feeling I took with me that evening can best be described as reassurance. I felt deeply, as I had never felt before, that Christmas is not only for the young and light of spirit. It belongs even more to the elderly and those who suffer.

All day I had experienced the spirit of Christmas. I had seen love in action, not in a superficial giving of gifts, but in a dedicated giving of self. I had seen joy, not the enjoyment of presents or jolly fellowship, but the joy that comes with complete yielding to God’s will. There had been faith and hope, the confident faith in God’s goodness, and the firm hope of eternal life with Him. The peace of Christmas was there, not the simple absence-of-strife kind of peace, but the peace that comes from having “fought a good fight and finished the course.”

I know more fully now that at the heart of Christmas is Emmanuel, God with us. God with us in love, in all kinds of circumstances, now and always!

Letter from Youth at Christmas

Dear Parents,

Do you as parents realize that the toys you purchase for your children help to build the foundations for their adulthood? Consider the following ideas before purchasing toys during this Christmas season.

If you are trying to cultivate a spirit of love and peace in your child, buying toy guns and other toys of war would only serve to destroy those principles which are so important.

Christmas is the time to celebrate the “birth of God’s Son, Jesus, who came into the world as the Prince of Peace. Toys which are created in the name of hate are a contradiction of what is celebrated.

Think back — as a child, wasn’t it fun to make your own barns, etc., from boxes and then paint them? How many times did that realistic store toy remain in a corner — broken and the charm gone? A toy with all of its minute detail and “realism” is difficult to pretend anything but what it represents.

Teach your child to be creative! Let him use his imagination and explore. Clay, paints, toy bricks, and constructive toys permit a child to be himself.

As you give gifts this Christmas season think first — would you have any hesitation about giving the same gift to the Christ child that you give to your own? May God’s richest blessings be yours as you purchase gifts during this season of peace and goodwill.

Christmas Sharing That Multiplies

Christmas sharing among friends or family can be given added significance by including a special gift to Christ and His church. A gift to Christ assures the giver of a gift gratefully received. More than that, it assures the giver that by giving in the right spirit, one's gift can be multiplied manyfold.

The Christmas Sharing arrangements for this year are of that nature. The Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities is focusing upon overseas training in churches abroad and workers in the total Board program at home. The Mennonite Board of Education gives special significance to the overseas student program. This makes possible the bringing of students from overseas churches to train in our church schools, thus expanding the church’s ministry by equipping overseas workers for witness and service in their respective countries. This gives an added dimension to your Christmas sharing this year.

Every family in the Mennonite Church is, therefore, invited to participate in the Christmas sharing by sending a ten-dollar gift to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Indiana, using the coupon printed in this issue for your mailing. What family in the Mennonite Church would spend less than this amount for sharing with family members or friends? This seems like a very small portion to ask for a particular gift to the church in this Christmas sharing. Yet if every family of the Mennonite brotherhood will share only ten dollars, think what this would mean! The Mennonite Yearbook records a membership of almost 95,000 members on the North American continent. This would involve more than 20,000 families. By sharing together in this way, we can therefore bring together a sum of $200,000 to carry forward the church’s program. How easily we can free the tight budgets that tend to plague our work. What better way of celebrating Christmas than to thus invest in the continuing ministry which Christ began and which was the purpose of His coming into the world.

Share your Christmas where it counts. Invest your family’s ten dollars in an important phase of the church’s continuing ministry. Share a deep sense of satisfaction by joining Mennonite Christian families of the North American continent and around the world in this Christmas sharing experience.

Make Christ central in your family Christmas through this unique symbolic act.—Howard J. Zehr, Executive Secretary, Mennonite General Conference

A Silent Voice

By Dave Collins

The situation seemed hopeless.

From the first day he entered my classroom, Willard P. Franklin had existed in his own world, shutting out his classmates and me, his teacher. My attempts at establishing a friendly relationship were met with complete indifference. Even a “Good morning, Willard” received only an inaudible grunt. From my point of observation, I could see that his classmates fared no better. Willard was strictly a “loner,” finding no desire or need to lower the barrier of silence he had erected.

Shortly after the Thanksgiving holidays, we received word of the annual Christmas collection.

“Christmas is a season of giving,” I told my students. “There are a few students in the school who might not have a happy holiday season. By contributing to our Christmas collection, you will help to buy food, clothing, and toys for these needy people. You may bring your money tomorrow.”

When I called for the contributions the next day, I discovered almost everyone had forgotten. Everyone except Willard P. Franklin. The boy dug deep into his pants pockets as he strolled up to my desk. Carefully he dropped a nickel into the small container.

“I don’t need no milk for lunch,” he mumbled. For a moment, just a moment, he smiled. I watched him turn and walk back to his desk.

That night, after school, I took our meager contribution to the school principal. I couldn’t help sharing the incident that had taken place.

“I may be wrong, but I believe Willard may be ready to become a part of the world around him,” I told the principal.

“ar, I believe it sounds hopeful,” he nodded. “And I have a hunch we might profit from him letting us share a bit of his world. I just received a list of the poor families of our school who most need help through the Christmas collection. Here, look at it.”

And as I gazed down to read, I discovered Willard P. Franklin and his family were the top names on the list.
Women's Liberation

By Norman G. Shenk

Crisis and revolution may soon become almost normal in our society. The women's revolution is now added to the youthful revolution, the minority racial revolution, and the revolution of the poor.

Some feel that women are the most oppressed and underprivileged class in any society. Men supposedly use the various resources of media, education, religion, laws, customs, and the economy to brainwash women into believing that their secondary position is natural and fulfilling to them.

Women's Liberation Movement is a collective term used to describe the many small groups of organized women throughout the country. Many feel that women are denied the opportunity to fulfill their talents and that the traditional sex roles and the family structure must be changed. The extreme view would eradicate all differences in sex roles. Professional women want to end sex discrimination in hiring, promotions, and salaries.

Many career women have been stymied by limited opportunity for advancement in administration and business control. Some are calling for equal opportunity of employment in construction and other strenuous roles.

Our social structure has been restrictive in the sex role for women. The nuclear family unconsciously fosters the concept that boys should do the manly thing while girls ought to be happy in the most feminine role possible. Our society further contributes to this when it seems appropriate for a father or a brother to give a bride in marriage. While this seems beautiful, let's try to think what would happen to the male image if mothers presented the groom as a gift to the bride in marriage. I think our present tradition unconsciously suggests that the bride is given to the young man almost to become his property, to bear his children, and to tend his house.

The church needs to assume some responsibility for the oppressive aspects of our culture which suppress a woman's role. The church was late in responding to other social ills like racism and should not be unduly late in honestly grappling with a reexamination of the position of women in society. An overemphasis upon "wives submit" without a consistent positive unselfish emphasis on "husbands love" may have contributed to the current problem. When we further have emphasized "keepers at home" without a balancing consistent theology and emphasis upon "there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus," it would seem to leave the Christian church somewhat responsible.

In fairness to the church, those who have visited and researched in other societies tell us that Christian influence has been positive in lifting the role of women in almost every area except Russia.

Today's church will gain credibility as an institution honestly concerned about the plight of humanity when we can honestly and openly look at the problem, examine our educational practices, and constructively structure for some changes.

Any organized society will require leadership. A healthy society must recognize individual independence while at the same time being sensitive to and accepting interdependence. I do not feel that there is as much hostility against male supremacy as there is a search for meaning and worth in a complex and frustrating society.

Modern technology makes it possible for a person to function in society without being dependent on physiology or strength. Human society is free to allow for the varied and individualistic development of all its members, both male and female. I believe it will be possible to eliminate the oppression of women without committing ourselves to identical roles and without suppressing the male.

Women today are becoming sensitively aware of a restrictive limited role and will only find fulfillment when their potential role is expanded. Most will likely want to recognize a very unique and distinct role as compared to that of men. There should be no apology made for the important task of giving time to children. This could well be given more status and made more creative with male involvement and shared responsibility. The distinct role of women could well include professional careers with equal wages, similar promotions, and equal opportunities, privileges, responsibilities, and benefits as available to men.

Society has little to lose and much to gain if all its members are given the freedom to find their own identity and can move forward in the search for meaning and worth.

Society is making real progress in the recognition of the fact that individuals have certain basic rights simply as human beings. This is in line with Jesus' own attitude when He did not despise a Samaritan woman or an infamous Mary.

Magdalene. I believe Jesus saw no intellectual or emotional inferiority in Mary of Bethany who shared with Him soul insights and effectual strength. Her sister Martha assumed a role more typically designated for women. Jesus did not respond in joy to her feminine inferiority or to her sense of servility.

Some of the requests and demands represent an extreme view which could not be wholeheartedly endorsed by the Christian church. However, we ought to be responsible to some of the legitimate criticism sharply focused in this Women’s Liberation Movement. Christian love should make us sensitively aware of wrong attitudes and assumptions we have fostered in the church. If Christian men will work unselfishly toward the elimination of oppression of women in today’s society, the influence will be far-reaching.

There should be clear and distinct roles for the male and the female but neither needs to be subservient. Let’s unselfishly work toward elevating the role of women and discover the strength of equality in male and female roles that honor God. I believe that positive action in this area will strengthen the influence of our church today.

Liberation—For Men and Women

By Katie Funk Wiebe

“The revolution that will affect everyone” is the way Life magazine describes the Women’s Liberation Front in the October 28 issue. News of the activities of this feminist movement continue to hit the newspapers; it does not promise to blow over quickly like a summer storm.

I have noticed in recent months that whenever Women’s Lib finds its way into conversation, it is usually as the brunt of an uneasy joke, as if there is something deeper here that should be faced, but which we haven’t got the courage to face. Women’s Lib is here, but we don’t like it.

The entire movement is particularly distasteful to Christians for several reasons: Christian tradition has little sympathy for women who assert themselves. Such action doesn’t seem to agree with “Let the women keep silent in the churches.” In opposition to this, Christian tradition forces men to hang onto whatever power and authority they can muster.

Women’s Lib is openly flouting both of these positions, producing hostility and uneasiness in the men who feel threatened and disdain in women who see it as ridiculous and unnatural.

What should the Christian woman think about Women’s Liberation?

I do not favor feminist movements, yet I see in this protest a desperate plea that the church, as well as society, examine the basic attitudes which exist between men and women.

As long as both men and women are pushed into stereotyped patterns of behavior which, on the one hand, require men to feel superior at the expense of women’s contribution to the kingdom of God, and which require the women to plead for greater opportunity, perhaps demand it at the expense of the men, the church will suffer.

I do not think the church can simply disregard this revolution, much as it would like to, because any upheaval in society’s view of women will affect home and religious life.

Furthermore, even if the church may disregard it, as more women work outside the home, they will soon become aware of some very real problems, especially with regard to the gross discrimination in pay scale between what women and men receive. Life magazine reports that in 1968 the median wage for a man in the U.S. was $7,664; the median wage for a woman was $4,456. Even when they are qualified, women are often simply not hired for better paying jobs, and they are paid less than a man for doing the same work in nearly every occupation.

Also, it does not take thinking women long to recognize that though opportunities in secular life are limited, women have an even more limited role in the church. Teaching Sunday school and leading children’s choirs are the main jobs open to them. Women in our churches hold few major offices and have no significant voice in making major decisions regarding the spiritual life of the church community.

(1 have at times wondered why a few of our older women, rich in wisdom and proven in godliness, could not join the church council, especially to help with problems relating to the home.)

An Eternity editorial on Women’s Lib says that some Christian men, including ministers, resemble Playboy fans in their attitude to women, yet in a different way. They may not exploit women for sexual purposes, but many a man dehumanizes women nevertheless. Women are frequently talked at like a child rather than conversed with like an adult with worthwhile thoughts. She is forced to compete with “other” inanimate objects such as TV and the family car for the master’s attention.

The issue finally is not whether women should keep silent or speak up, but whether they are treated like persons and not like objects.

Dr. Mary Calderone, writing in Life, says that it is not the women, but the men who need liberating. Women have made tremendous strides in many areas, but men have remained trapped by the stereotype of the physically and intellectually superior male. They are not free to be tender, gentle, empathetic, nurturing, and artistic. She adds that women will have to help set them free from this pattern of life.

I believe that in the church both men and women need to reaffirm their faith in one another instead of feeling threatened or becoming demanding. Men need to reassure women that they have more to offer than the stereotyped patterns many have been forced into; women to reaffirm that men have a contribution to make other than through power and dominance.

Men cannot run the church alone, neither can women. They need each other's support, but not at the expense of one another. We need to accept that the Bible which states, "The head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man," also says ... there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." If we can't find the truth in this, why bother with the part of the same verse which talks about all races being equal before Christ?

"As I See It"

I have read lately that some of the brotherhood are advocating that we withhold payment of a part of our income tax as a vigorous protest against what the government is doing with this money. The argument used is that in so doing we can most effectively bring about discussion which will allow us to testify against the evils which we generally agree are present. Some of us have reservations about this method. I would like to suggest another very effective way to do the same thing. By way of example let us take a family of four with gross earnings of $7,000. Personal deductions are $2,100, there may be other deductions of $400 plus a tithe of $700. According to 1969 schedules the tax would be $384. If the giving of this family would double, all else being the same, the tax would be $444. The tax actually paid would be reduced by about 24 percent and in a perfectly acceptable manner. Perhaps our dissenting brethren would condemn this method for this very reason. However, this method actually decreases taxes and greatly increases the good that we can accomplish through the various agencies the church uses to serve in the world. I dare say that the practice proposed by our brethren would bring the necessary officials to attach bank accounts, confiscate property, and in other ways forcibly see to it that the unpaid tax, plus penalties and interest charges, were paid. In the end, who has paid the lesser tax and served to help the most people? — Howard Blosser, Dayton, Ohio

For some time, the question of draft resistance has been one that troubles many of us. Nonresistance has long been a practice of the Anabaptist brotherhood. Currently, however, we are being told from some quarters that nonresistance is obsolete, that it is not biblical, and that a more valid stance in this era is that of nonviolent resistance to evil.

Out of this concept grows the current belief on the part of some that draft resistance (including nonregistration and draft card burning) is a proper action for Christ's disciples in 1970. Many of us admire the courage of our young men who are willing to go to prison for their beliefs, or who abandon home and family to go to another country.

Also, out of this movement have come some positive elements: increasingly youth is being confronted with the probability that earning I-W may not really be a viable option in the 1970s. But what troubles many of us is that this change does not seem to be solidly based on Scripture. In fact, at least some of the draft resistance movement appears to be based on a humanistic philosophy, rather than Scripture.

Unhappily, much of the literature printed supporting draft resistance gives scant attention to the Bible. The purpose of this article is to attempt to elucidate a few simple statements of scriptural truth, and invite discussion. It is to be hoped that someone will articulate the doctrine of nonviolent resistance on a truly biblical basis, if indeed it can be done.

Let us now look at several basic truths, out of which such a discussion might arise:

1. The premeditated violation of a civil law is a very serious matter for the New Testament Christian. According to the late H. S. Bender, there are two instances in the New Testament when the apostles did deliberately violate civil law, Acts 5:29 and 4:19. They disobeyed civil law when they were commanded to cease teaching in Christ’s name. Acts 5:28 and 4:18. It is to be noted, of course, that the Jewish religious authorities had considerable latitude in establishing civil law. There are other instances when the apostles were imprisoned, but these cases were not because of a willful deliberate violation of established civil law. Such cases as this can be found in Acts 12:4, 16:23, etc.

It seems to be clear from Scripture that Christian pilgrims are under a definite obligation to obey the laws of the land in which they are ambassadors. Romans 13:1, 2; 1 Peter 2:13-17. There would appear to be two grounds to Resist, That Is the Question

By Dean M. Brubaker

on which we legitimately can and must disobey civil law; if compliance with the law compels us to do something forbidden in Scripture or if compliance with the law forbids us to do something required in Scripture; then we have no choice. However, we dare not in a premeditated fashion, disobey a law merely because we find it inconvenient, or because we feel it is unwise. It is not here being said that a Christian cannot seek to change such a law. We have a duty to "exhort" fellow Christians regarding what is right. This might well include fellow believers who happen to be legislators. The point is simply that as long as the law is in effect, we are instructed to honor and obey it.

2. The movement from a stance of absolute nonresistance per se to a stance of nonviolent resistance is unscriptural, and has far-reaching consequences. Jesus taught that the love of a Christian is of such a caliber that His disciples are to offer the other cheek when smitten, Matthew 5:38-44. As Christians, we are sent out into a wicked warring world as harmless and defenseless lambs. Luke 10:5. As Christians, we never pay back "evil for evil, but always keep looking for ways to show kindness to one another and everybody." (1 Thess. 5:15, Williams). As Christians, we are to suffer in love when we are wronged. Just as Christ did. 1 Peter 2:21-24.

The supreme expression of Christ's nonresistance or "Almighty Meekness" (to use the beautiful phrase of N. P. Grubb) is found in His suffering and death. Here the nonresistance of Christ was tested most severely. Yet, we read that Christ "held his peace," that He "reviled not again," and that He "threatened not." The movement from a stance of such absolute nonresistance to a stance of militant nonresistance appears to have little if any precedent in Scripture.

Furthermore, there is great danger in such a change. The nonviolent resistance movement does have some positive aspects, but these very aspects may add to its danger. Once we assert that nonviolent resistance is permissible or even biblical, we have in effect said that the end justifies the means—which is precisely the thing some "Christian" militarists say!

Christians are ever and always loving and compassionate people. As Christ's disciples, we must feed the hungry, give water to the thirsty, clothing to the naked, hospitality to the stranger, and loving visitation to the imprisoned. Our efforts in these directions should be doubled, tripled, and quadrupled to begin with!

However, our compassion for the impoverished, underprivileged, and war-stricken people must never cause us to abandon a biblical truth. If we do, we are on quicksand, for we may find the next movement will be from nonviolent resistance to violent resistance, and history clearly affirms this. The largest of the three historic peace churches taught nonresistance up to the time of the first World War. Between the two world wars, however, there was a shift in emphasis so that by the mid 1930s, nonviolent resistance was not only condoned, but advocated. The result? During World War II, 80 percent of the denomination's young men went directly into combatant military service, 10 percent went into noncombatant military service, and 10 percent went into CPS. Once the principle of absolute nonresistance is abandoned, the stage may be set for an even more serious movement.

3. The concept that registering with Selective Service is part and parcel of the military establishment is open to serious question. Conscription is the command of the state to do work, and Jesus told His disciples to accept conscription, apparently even on the part of Roman authorities. Matthew 5:41. It can well be argued that registration is a civil, not a military procedure. As H. S. Bender put it, "registration is a part of the procedure of conscription, but for the man who takes civilian service, it is not a part of military conscription." If registration automatically meant induction into the armed forces, then a nonresistant Christian would have no choice; he legitimately should not register. But in our society, registration is a method whereby some young men are required to go into military life, and some young men are required to work in civilian capacities, under civilian direction. To argue that the Selective Service system is inequitable, discriminatory, and unfair misses the point. Again, where in Scripture are we told to disobey a law because we consider it unfair or unwise?

Furthermore, one who fails to register is arrested by civilian, not military authorities. He is tried by a civilian court, not a military court. He serves time in a nonmilitary jail. To argue that registration implies that one has become a part of the whole military machine would lead to other untenable conclusions. Since illiterates are not drafted, one might well say that the public school system is a part of the military machine, since it helps ready young men for future military service. Should we then, logically, oppose the attendance of our children in school?

4. To serve Christ is the high calling and the great privilege of the Christian. And to serve Christ means that we serve people. Matthew 25:31-46. It is quite conceivable that one could witness to his faith while being imprisoned, but it is also true that in prison, one is sub-ected to far greater regimentation than in the military forces. It is indeed difficult to believe that one could serve Christ (people) in love and compassion by making little rocks out of big rocks!

For the young person who for reasons of conscience finds that registration puts him in an intolerable position, perhaps the only real alternative is to become a citizen of a country where such registration is not required. For a citizen of the United States, this would involve renouncing his citizenship, and becoming a citizen of another country, perhaps Canada. If there were no legal provision for such a change of citizenship, even this option would be open to question. We can truly respect the man who makes this change in earthly citizenship; it is far more biblical than fleeing to Canada one step ahead of the FBI. Again, the principle is simply that as a Christian, we are under a deep obligation to be law-abiding citizens.

It is anticipated that these views will be found quite unacceptable in some quarters, but in the words of J. B. Toews, the views presented here "may appear naive, Utopian, unrealistic, and unworkable in our modern world; yet in view of Christ's exemplary life, authoritative teaching, and redemptive death, we humbly but strongly affirm: 'Thither lies truth.'"

Preachers, Advance!

By Myron S. Augsburger

The "watchman on the wall" should apologize to no one for his existence. He only needs to perform his assignment well. "But if the trumpet give an uncertain sound," how will others determine priorities for engagement in battle? There are functions which the preacher is called to fulfill which no other person will perform in the same way.

Today various forces have converged to render "the man of God" ineffective. Areas of need which were once carried by pastors have been taken over by other organizations, either in the congregation or denomination. Rather than feeling that he now has "release time" for his primary roles, the pastor too often feels threatened or unwanted, and is rendered psychologically ineffective. He should find ways to encourage others in their work and put his best energies into the areas that are uniquely his. People still want to be counseled, to be visited, even to be disciplined by a concerned "shepherd." Sharing a person's problems is a lonely role, for the pastor must stand by the person with understanding, yet he cannot share the burden fully with any other. Pastors, like doctors, are needed for the spiritual and moral health of a community. They must function with the professional ethics that does not call for vindication of their role.

Consciously or unconsciously pastors are also intimidated by the more educated. Unfortunately people with "new" knowledge like those with new money often lack the ability to use it well. A pseudosophistication cuts them off from those who don't "have it," as well as from those who "have it." When patterns of achievement that are inauthentic alienate persons, it is often the pastor who gets caught in arbitrating while at the same time being made to feel unqualified to understand. Furthermore, in a small denomination with an increased emphasis on education, the "expertise" of the educated intimidates the unlettered pastor.

It need not be so. People still want to hear the Word, still need to learn the power of prayer, and still respond to compassion for people. The educated man in the pew is not there for a postgraduate lecture in his field but for prophetic utterance to help sanctify the learning which already threatens achievement of a well-furbished soul. More people are starved emotionally than intellectually.

In more cases than not, pastors are inundated by organization. Good organization is simply structure which increases the flow of significant work. When men must keep up organization or program for its own sake, they have become institutionalized! Of all men, the pastor should demonstrate that structure is only a tool. It is people who count, not primarily program. When people are involved, men's spirits are being inspired, the community of believers is being led to fellowship, and the program is working. But failing to involve people with God while building a "paper kingdom" or concentrating on social status is not enhancing the mission to which men of God are called. Pastors must know their people, must be acquainted with their public. You cannot convert men with whom you do not converse. People want to see that the pastor is for real! "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us." Let "the man of God" get out from under and move among men; then he can share Christ.

We can turn the world upside down again, but not by standing forever on the backside of our deserts. The God who stands in the bush which burns is there to be noticed, to be heard, to be obeyed. He issues our commission — let no one intimidate us. Let us become aggressive with the gospel. In paraphrasing the words of Paul, we can say, "I'm not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, it has never let me down, it always does what it says it will." Preachers, advance!
Whom Are You Kidding?

"When a man says he can't keep awake through a 20-minute sermon, and stays home with his 700-column newspaper, whom is he kidding?

When a man says Sunday is his only day of rest, and gets up real early to go fishing, or spends the day on the golf course, whom is he kidding?

When a man says the church seats are too hard and uncomfortable, then goes on some Saturday to sit on a bleacher for hours in a drizzle watching 22 men push one another back and forth across a mud lot... whom is he kidding?

When a man says he can't afford to tithe but lives in a comfortable home, drives a new car, eats well, clothes his family stylishly, whom is he kidding?

When a man says he doesn't have time for Christ and His church, then spends evenings bowling, watching television, going to clubs, playing cards, having evenings out with "the boys"... whom is he kidding?

Not God!

Is It Worthwhile?

When asked if he was anxious for Christmas to come, a little boy answered, "Aw, you have to be good so long, 'tain't worthwhile."

Many adults have the same feeling about the Christian life. It is too much of a strain to be as good as they feel they should be, for such a long time.

But the daily reward and satisfaction of one who truly serves Christ is of inestimable worth. And the Gift, when it finally comes, far exceeds anything we could ever expect for Christmas. — Ida Plank Yoder

Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) plans to reintroduce a bill designed to limit families to two children by eliminating tax exemption for other children. "Our survival depends on our willingness to reduce our population growth," he maintains.

A Chicago woman psychologist, however, told a medical convention that "two-baby curbs" and similar measures are an "insult to the diversity of feminine personality and capabilities."

Dr. Niles Newton of the Northwestern University psychiatry department declared that women resent the suggestion they should have "two babies—period" and are "polluters" if they go beyond that number.

"It overlooks the fact that there are many women who would be far happier and more useful to society with no children at all and that other women are such gifted mothers that they should have more than two," she noted.

The psychologist cited a study revealing that people who grew up with several brothers and sisters tend to make "good neighbors," while only 20 percent of those in a family of one or two children were given that classification.

A substantial number of today's college students are involved in religious activities, and have considered full-time religious careers at some time in their lives. This is one of the findings of a three-year research project reported a recent meeting of the American Association of Theological Schools, held at the School of Theology at Claremont, Calif. The results of the study were described by Douglas Lewis, director of the National Cooperative Enlistment Project. A random sample of 1,000 students at Northwestern University and the University of Chicago were interviewed. Fifty-eight percent of the respondents said they are now engaged in religious activities, and 35 percent said they had considered religious careers at some time during their lives.

Miss Elizabeth Platz, who received her bachelor of divinity degree in 1965, became the first woman minister of the Lutheran Church in America when she was ordained on Nov. 22.

An ordination ceremony was held in the Chapel of the University of Maryland at College Park, Md., where she has been serving as assistant to the Lutheran chaplain for the past five years.

Miss Platz, a 30-year-old native of Pittsburgh, has been called as a campus pastor to the University of Maryland Lutheran Chaplaincy.

A psychologist says he has found that the average person thinks about religion at least twice as many times a day as he thinks about sex. Age has a lot to do with it, however.

Dr. Paul D. Cameron and his student assistants from the University of Louisville asked 3,416 people what they were thinking about during the preceding five minutes.

The survey revealed, according to Dr. Cameron, that:

— Young adults (18-25) think about sex at least once in any 10-minute period; middle-aged people, at least every 35 minutes; and people over 65, once an hour.

— Young adults think about religion once every 25 minutes; middle-aged, once every 15 minutes; and old people, once every 10 minutes.

The survey also found that people think about dying rather frequently — young people every 25 minutes and old people every 15 minutes.

Dr. Cameron says male thought turned out to be more egocentric than female, with women spending more time thinking about religion and death.

Responses to the survey, further, failed to substantiate the widely held belief that "young people nowadays are thinking more about world and social problems than their parents are."

The psychologist also asked those surveyed how much time they spend thinking about their pets and housework, and whether their mood was happy, sad, or neutral during the preceding half hour.

Middle-aged people appear to think about their pets as often as they think about sex. Dr. Cameron says, adding that this indicates a "phony, strange, inhuman, and time-consuming relationship with household animals.

A former clergyman and seminary professor who now serves as a consultant to churches says that the main difficulty with congregations today is their "fuzziness about goals."

"Most churches are unsure of what they are about," says Dr. Josiah R. Bartlett, "and so, are unable to devise effective ways of ministry."

Instead of "corolling their people" and trying to raise money for "routines they've inherited," he says, they should "clarify and focus their aims in relation to people's real needs."

"In this poll-happy age, churches have been surveyed to death," the consultant said. "The Vanguard Project steers clear of the usual ruts. It breaks new ground."

At its heart is a Vanguard committee, a carefully selected cross section of the congregation, which puts the program into "orbit." Vanguard members, unlike the typical church surveyors, do not talk to themselves or solicit only the faithful and the workhorses. "They go in search of the more difficult ones," Dr. Bartlett explained, "those who are restless and have drifted away. What did they want? Where did they go?"

American society appears to be headed "back to the Dark Ages," a Roman Catholic bishop told delegates to the 56th annual meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Charities (NCCC).

"It is clearly possible that we, in our day, are dealing with the forces of hell in a more critical way than in any recent history," said the bishop, honorary president of NCCC.

As examples of his concern, he cited "Congressional action to penalize citizens for begetting children; national publications which ridicule and impugn the honor, dignity, and sanctity of motherhood; and the sociologist who repudiates the very core of his science by saying that the family—society's basic institution—is now passe."

The church, he continued, "has declared its commitment to caring for the poor. We have assumed the duty to war on the conditions of poverty, discrimination, and deprivation."

But, the bishop declared, "we are losing the battles. Let us improvise and update before we lose the whole war on need."

Many children in the District of Columbia whose homes once had few or no books (and who were put off by the formality of lending libraries) are becoming book owners. They have been finding books for the taking in local supermarkets, laundromats, the corner playground, or a mobile library parked nearby. A free book program for ghetto youngsters arose from the belief of a group of Washington citizens that easy access and ownership of books instilled a love of reading in children who might otherwise be turned away from literature at an early age.

The idea has spread beyond the District since starting there in 1968, and the program has received an additional $400,000 from the Ford Foundation. Called National Reading-is-Fundamental, it has distributed 1,475,000 books to some 300,000 disadvantaged children in black, rural white, Mexican-American, and American-Indian communities all over the country.
The following article appeared in the September 16 issue of Bibel und Pfiff, the publication of the South American Mennonites, under the title, Ein Unverständerlicher Bokott and refers to the disscussion on the site of the Ninth Mennonite World Conference in 1972 which is scheduled for Curitiba. Writer of this statement is Klaus Duck, Montevideo, who is president of the Conference of Mennonites in South America.

The decision of the Mennonites of Holland not to send any delegates to the Ninth Mennonite World Conference in Curitiba was a severe shock for our congregations in Brazil. It showed neither a brotherly spirit nor any understanding of the situation in South America.

In response to this action, the IMPC (the International Mennonite Peace Committee) took a position which has partly reduced the resolution's impact but which has also strengthened it. In a commendable way, the committee has tried to demonstrate positive ways of preparation and development so that the world conference can be a blessed experience.

Both groups cannot avoid political entanglements. The major purpose of a world conference is to deal with something other than political questions. As Christians, we should clearly proclaim the Word of God and take a position against unrighteousness and oppression. On this, we stand firm.

The only question is one of emphasis. Shall we as Mennonites go out into the streets and add our voices to the revolutionary clamor on our continent? Our duty as Christians is more definitely in the direction of being peacemakers after the example of Jesus Christ, putting the gospel of love into deeds, healing wounds rather than inflicting new ones.

We have enough opportunities to join in the building of a just society on this continent without needing to identify ourselves with bearded (and often brutal) extremists. Recent events in Uruguay have shown us the kind of brutality that these radicals are capable of.

Anyway, I am sure that we have plenty of other things to talk about in 1972 in Curitiba without needing to touch on the political system of the host nation. I don't recall that we discussed the monarchy in 1967 at Amsterdam, though this is a controversial issue for some. We just do not have enough time even to list all the open doors where we have an opportunity to help and to heal and to contribute to the building of a better social order.

Therefore, it seems to me that people in Europe are totally misinformed about South America in general, and especially about Brazil. The hasty decision of the Lutheran World Federation to cancel its world conference in Brazil is evidence of this. Now our brothers in Holland are singing the same tune. Our modern mass media sends news around the world in a fraction of a second. The quantity of news is so great and the hearers are so numb that only the most exaggerated and sensational reports are heard. Out of this, the hearer forms his opinion which is often distorted. This is what also happens with the reporting on South America. A visit to South America would in every case produce a better picture of this continent.

Brazil is a nation standing on the brink of anarchy, but in recent years, tremendous strides have been made in every area on the road to a free democracy.

The Mennonites in Holland have made their participation in Curitiba dependent on five demands. Among other things, they ask for a guarantee of their personal safety. What kind of guarantee did our delegates require in order to go to Amsterdam in 1967? Accidents could have happened to them even in fully developed Holland.

Really, who can give such a guarantee? Did the Apostle Paul ask for a guarantee when he took the gospel to the cities of Asia Minor and Europe? Is this what Menno Simons did when he visited his brothers in the cities along the coasts of the North and Baltic seas? A brother visiting his brother does not demand a guarantee for his personal safety.

We are grieved by the decision of our brothers in Holland. In 1962, South America withdrew its invitation in order that the Eighth Mennonite World Conference might be held in Amsterdam in 1967. Will we be frustrated once again?

... May God grant that the World Conference in Curitiba, in spite of dark clouds, will be a blessed experience for our brotherhood. As hosts, we in the south want to give ourselves fully toward that end. — Klaus Duck, The Mennonite.
of peacemaking with prayers, brotherly solicitude;” and offered to assist in the raising of funds for the journey. Already over $800 has been raised.

The Peace Section asked Doug to “communicate to the peoples of Vietnam — North and South — our regret for the war which has so brutally ravished their land, our commitment as a church to the gospel of peace and reconciliation, and our readiness to cooperate with them in the rebuilding of their country.”

MCC Hosts Soviet Baptists

Three members of the All Union Council of Evangelical Christian-Baptists (AUCECB) of the Soviet Union visited Mennonite Central Committee headquarters in Akron, Pa., Nov. 12 and 13.

Mr. Grigorin Bulgakov, pastor at Gorki; Miss Valentina Ryndina, student of language at Moscow University and employee of the AUCECB at its Moscow headquarters; and Mr. Peter Shatrov, superintendent of the churches in the Leningrad area and spokesman for the group, were accompanied by Mr. Adolf Klaupiks, former relief coordinator for the Baptist World Alliance, who translated for them. Mr. Klaupiks is an American.

The group came to America to attend a Pentecostal Conference in Dallas, Texas. The AUCECB is a union of Evangelical Christians, Baptists, Pentecostals, and the Mennonite Brethren Church. Following the conference, the group visited Baptist church centers and MCC. They were very interested in learning about the Mennonites here, our forms of worship and our expressions of faith. Pastors Shatrov and Bulgakov both have contact with Mennonites in the congregations they serve in Russia and spoke with appreciation of the Mennonites’ contribution to their churches.

Following a fellowship dinner at which the group met with representatives of the Lancaster Mennonite churches and MCC, they enjoyed an impromptu rendition by the Lancaster Choral Singers of selections from Bach’s Cantata No. 4. Hiram Hershey conducted the chorus which happened to be practicing in the building at the time the Russian visitors were there. They also visited the MCC Material Aid Center in Ephrata, Pa.

MCC sent greetings back with Miss Ryndina and Pastors Bulgakov and Shatrov to the AUCECB.

Probe in Evangelism

Necessary

In an age of space probes and undersea exploration, a probe of the inner man becomes not a luxury, but a necessity.

Rene Dubos, head of the department of Environmental Bio Medicine at Rockefeller University, sees a crisis ahead for man, a crisis in the quality of living. In a guest editorial in Life magazine Dubos evaluated the tensions and distortions of stress to which modern man is continually exposed.

“Survival is not enough,” Dubos concluded. Man needs the qualities of peace within and biological stability without.

PROBE ’72 will be an exploration in the inner worlds of man, in his social relationships as well as his heart and soul. The all-Mennonite Consultation on Evangelism, PROBE ’72, in Chicago’s Conrad Hilton Hotel, Apr. 13-16, 1972, will explore the most effective means of bringing the peace of God to the complete life-style of modern men, through Jesus Christ.

Previous Mennonite evangelism efforts have not been overly successful, as Palmer Becker, Home Missions director for the General Conference Mennonite Church, detailed.

“Very often we have communicated theology to people,” Becker pointed out. “We have introduced people to a plan of salvation rather than to the Planner, rather than to Jesus Christ and a dynamic relationship with Him.” Becker noted that a deeply motivated Christian is more likely to grapple with life-style problems, both in his own life and that of his neighbors.

PROBE ’72 will explore the most effective life-changing methods of evangelism in its three-day intensive sessions.

Mennonites who are involved in witness in a variety of areas of life will document their activities to the consultation. Specific areas or types of ministry through which evangelism is being carried out by Mennonites will mark out the program areas for PROBE '72. These include: Evangelism Through Teaching, The Healing Arts, Preaching, Retreats and Small Groups, Social Evangelism, Peace Witness and Voluntary Service, Music and the Arts, Coffeehouse and Youth Activities, Mass Media.

Actual examples of evangelism will be supported by personal experiences in each area. Each of these area experiences will lead to in-depth exploration of how a Christian may expand his personal effectiveness as a life-changer.

"Evangelism is not an option for the Christian," summed up J. B. Toews, President of Mennonite Brethren Seminary, Fresno, California. "Only the methods are optional. "There is a distinct biblical principal," he continued. "As Anabaptists, we reject the escapist theology which saves a man from involvement in his neighbor's need."

"But we also reject the theology which permits us to work only on the outer man and his social situation, and fail to confront him with his need for Christ. "If our PROBE can bring the focus of a fraternal thrust in evangelism, that will be a historic moment in inter-Mennonite activities," Toews concluded.

The theme for the all-Mennonite Consultation emphasizes this three-pronged exploration for a fully developed evangelism: PROBE: Into the Scripture for understanding Into ourselves for honesty
Into our world for relevance

The consultation will draw upon experiences of local congregations, which are urged to send one or more members to participate. Further information is available from Eugene Wimmer, Executive Secretary, PROBE '72, Box 127, New Holland, Pa. 17557.

Study for Mentally Handicapped

Trinity Mennonite Church, 4334 W. Vista Ave., Glendale, has received a Project Study and Development Grant from the Arizona State Department for Mental Retardation. John B. Mumaw, Harrisonburg, Va., has been employed as Study Director. The objective of the study is to survey the Glendale, Peoria, Sun City, and El Mirage communities to determine the program needs in these communities, the employment and training possibilities for the mentally handicapped. The greater emphasis of the study will be upon the evaluation of data with the possible development of a program for small-group residential living for the mentally handicapped.

Mumaw, former President of Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., is presently serving as Executive Secretary of the Mennonite Medical Association. He is also a member of a number of Boards and committees ministering to the mentally retarded including Mennonite Mental Health Services Board.

Mumaw began the study on Dec. 1 and projects a two-month period for the study. His office is located at the Trinity Mennonite Church, 4334 W. Vista Ave., Glendale, Ariz. 85301.

Helen Alderfer, Editor of On the Line

Words of Cheer Becomes On the Line

On the Line is the new name for Words of Cheer beginning January 3, 1971. On the Line will serve the same junior and intermediate audience with a similar mix of stories, articles, and letters from readers. In many ways On the Line will be much the same as Words of Cheer. Helen Alderfer continues as editor; the price is the same; it will be eight pages, two colors; it is purchased in the same way. On the other hand On the Line will have a smaller page size, with heavier paper, and new design.

The objectives of On the Line, according to Editor Helen Alderfer, will be to make the message of the Bible attractive to young persons and to help them grow in understanding of God, themselves, and their Mennonite heritage.

The paper will emphasize Mennonite history and heroes of the work of the present-day church. There are to be articles to help solve problems, articles on the wonder of God's world and appreciation for the Bible.

On the Line will be published jointly by Faith and Life Press and Mennonite Publishing House. Editor Helen Alderfer is a pastor's wife and former schoolteacher. Her husband, Edwin, is pastor of Kingview Mennonite Church in Scottsdale. The Alderferes have had various assignments in the work of the church, including four years with Mennonite Central Committee in the Philippine Islands.

Associate Editor for On the Line is Cornelia Lehman, Director of Children's Work at Faith and Life Press. Cornelia was born in Russia, moved to Canada, and is a Canadian citizen. She has served with Mennonite Central Committee in the U.S. and in Europe. She has also been an editor of children's papers, both in German and in English.

Helen Alderfer says that On the Line is a matter-of-fact kind of name for the junior-age child who prefers to have his material straight. The name was suggested by a Mennonite pastor and rated high with several groups of children and adults.

Words of Cheer has served the Mennonite Church for 95 years as a paper for children. It is the hope of editors and publishers that On the Line will be a worthy successor.

Radio Spots Receive Wide Usage

Disc No. 20 in the Family Life Radio Spot Series is receiving prime use, according to a Mennonite Broadcasts response report. The spots were mailed to 421 stations across North America in June 1970, and 107 stations have since responded to a follow-up survey. From these responses the following facts evolve:

- 89 percent of the stations released the spots daily
- 66 percent used them more than once daily
- 80 percent plan to use them indefinitely or until new spots arrive

Disc No. 20 speaks to the concept that "marriage is for love — and that takes hearing each other. Communication problems are a source of family tensions which can be resolved with the resources God can provide."

Radio spot series No. 21, mailed out Sept. 21, 1970, asserts that "it's a tough job being a husband and father in today's world. It takes all a man has and more to be the person his family needs. And a bit of God's help is indispensable." The disc is currently being aired across the U.S. and Canada.

Spot series No. 22, to be released in Jan. 1971, will treat the theme of problems in money matters "that can be resolved by deliberate, shared decision-making, as husband and wife develop long-range values. These values include putting people..."
Mennonite Newspaper to Fold After 17 Years

The Canadian Mennonite, a weekly tabloid newspaper which has been serving the various Mennonite groups across Canada for 17 years, will cease publication in early 1971.

The decision to suspend publication was made at the annual meeting of the Canadian Mennonite Publishing Association recently. This organization is an independent inter-Mennonite agency which has been attempting to promote the creative use of various communications media. The association's 500 members come from across Canada and represent all the major Mennonite groups in the country.

Reasons given for the folding of the paper were (1) a steady decrease in circulation—the number of subscribers dropped from 6,000 to 4,300 in the past four years—and (2) financial difficulties.

Jamaica Couple Visits Virginia Churches

Ransford and Iris Nicholson, pastor-couple of the Calvary Mennonite Church in Retreat, Jamaica, arrived in the United States on Nov. 9 for a fraternal visit to a number of Mennonite churches in Virginia Conference.

Nicholson spoke in the Harrisonburg, Waynesboro, and Norfolk areas and participated in the annual Fall Missions Conference, Nov. 26-29, at Sarasota, Fla. Following the conference, he conducted a series of revivals at the Newtown Chapel in Sarasota. While in Harrisonburg, Nicholson also spoke at Eastern Mennonite High School, Eastern Mennonite College and Seminary, and Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc.

Nicholson was a migrant worker in the States in 1958. He found the Lord through Mennonite brethren in Sarasota and became active in Christian service upon his return to Jamaica. He has had four years of training at Jamaica Theological Seminary and currently serves as secretary for the Jamaica Mennonite Conference.

The Nicholsons have a two-year-old son who stayed with the Kenneth Brunk family in Jamaica while the couple made their stateside visit.

18 Enter VS in November

The final Voluntary Service orientation school for 1970, Nov. 9-19, saw 18 participants accepting one- or two-year assignments at 13 locations across North America with Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind.

First row: John and Delores Birkey, Goshen, Ind., community service worker and day care teacher, respectively, with the Stockton, Calif., VS unit for two years; Rebecca Bishop, Dovestown, Pa., licensed practical nurse for one year at Mennonite Hospital, La Junta, Colo.; Linda House, Carthage, N.Y., one year as a registered nurse at Davis Appalachian Regional Hospital, Arch, Ky.; Jay Dyck, Newton, Kan., two years as a community service worker with the Kansas City, Mo., unit; and Jerre Bontrager, Scott City, Kan., stockroom worker at Mt. Sinai Hospital, Cleveland, Ohio, for two years.

Second row: Stephen and Rachel Everingham, Goshen, Ind., houseparents with the Detroit, Mich., unit for one year; Jerry Stoltzfus, Carlisle, N.M., unassigned; Jeffrey Miller, Orrville, Ohio, orderly for two years at Sullivan County Home, Claremont, N.H.; Carolyn Rager, Louisville, Ohio, child care worker with the Winston-Salem, N.C., unit for one year; and Carley Stoltzfus, Manitou, Ohio, one year as secretary with the Kansas City, Mo., unit.

Third row: Twila Buller, Kalispell, Mont., child care worker for one year at Sunshine Children's Home, Maumee, Ohio; LaVonne Graber, Montgomery, Ind., nurse aide at Sullivan County Home, Claremont, for one year; Lee Polacheck, Engadine, Mich., two years as a construction worker with the Pass Christian, Miss., unit; Miriam Beachy, Darien Center, N.Y., community service worker with the Northwest Portland, Ore., unit for one year; Joel Gross, Dovestown, Pa., two years as a community service worker with the Durham, N.C., unit; and Ray Hochstetler, Nappanee, Ind., maintenance/janitorial worker at St. Anthoine's Hospital, St. Petersburg, Fla.

The first VS orientation school for 1971 is scheduled for Jan. 4-14 with 17 or more persons expected to attend. Currently 33 volunteers 18 years of age through senior adult are stationed in 56 locations in the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Puerto Rico with Mennonite Board of Missions.

Hard work and cooperation turned a rainy fall day into another successful relief sale. The Michiana Mennonite Relief Sale committee held their sale on Sept, 26, 1970, at the Goshen, Ind., fairgrounds. Edward Brookmyer, Sec-Treas. of the committee, hands John Hostetler, MCC representative, the results—$70,548.10.
FIELD NOTES

Ivan R. Lind, 60, associate professor of Old Testament at Eastern Mennonite College, died of an apparent heart attack in his Route 6, Harrisonburg, home on Nov. 20. Before coming to EMC last year, Bro. Lind served on the faculty of Heaton College for 31 years. He joined the Heaton College faculty in 1938 and began a seven-year term as dean in 1941. The remainder of the time he taught in the fields of Bible, sociology, psychology, economics, and business education. Obituary to follow.

Macon Gwin, pastor of the Berea Mennonite Church in Atlanta, Georgia, reports that he had "the wonderful joy of taking in four young people for baptism who have accepted the Lord Jesus Christ." He said, "Our goal for the new month is to try to set a good foundation for our youth, both in the church and the community."

Laura Kurtz, Eastern Board missionary, returned to Tanzania on Nov. 22. She will serve at Katzke Teacher Training College (P.O. Box 89, Bukoba, Tanzania), an alliance institution where teachers serving Tanganyika Mennonite Church are trained. A commissioning service was held for Miss Kurtz at the Rock Mennonite Church, Elkhart, Ind., on Oct. 18. J. Clyde Sherf brought the message. Miss Kurtz recently completed studies at New York University in educational psychology.

Special notice to Sunday school leaders: On the Line is the name for Words of Cheer beginning Jan. 3, 1971. There is no change in price or basic intention. It continues as a paper for juniors and intermediates. If you have ordered Words of Cheer for children in your Sunday school, you will receive On the Line, beginning with the issue of Jan. 3, 1971. See news story on page 1019.

Eastern Mennonite College has received notification of a gift of books valued at $1,600 from the Xerox Corporation in Rochester, New York. The corporation is donating sets of "The March of America" and Vaniti Fair to EMC as a member of the Council for the Advancement of Small Colleges (CASC). Other CASC members will receive similar gifts. Present library holdings number more than 56,000 volumes.

Maple Grove Winter Bible School to be held at the Maple Grove Mennonite Church, Atglen, Pa., Jan. 18-29. Instructors include: Herman Glick, Christian Charles, Charles Gogel, Noah Hershey, and Elam Stauffer.

Elkhart County, Ind., ministers and seminarians met in a special service in the Chapel of the Seminar on the Mount on Nov. 17 to hear Leighton Ford speak on the topic of "Evangelism." The meeting was part of a pre-crusade visit by Ford and his team to Elkhart in preparation for an evangelistic crusade to be held in Elkhart in April 1971.

Several Mennonite songwriters were featured in a service of contemporary worship songs presented by the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries chorus. The selections were taken from the second issue of Hymns for Now and the June 1969 issue of With, an inter-Mennonite publication for youth. Contemporary religious themes were expressed in songs of joy, adulation, and reflection.

Change of address: Fred Gingerich from Alpha, Minn., to College Ave., Park View, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801. Milton Brackbill from Pooi, Pa., to 2749 Prospect, Sarasota, Fla. 33579.

New members by baptism: two at Madisonville, Iowa, nine at Valparaiso, Ind.; three at Green Terrace, Wernersville, Pa.; two at South Seventh St., Reading, Pa.; two at Alcass Manor, Temple, Pa.; fifteen at Central, Archbold, Ohio.

Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., announced on Nov. 25 that it stands ready to commit up to $10,000 to the Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa., for emergency relief in East Pakistan, scene of recent cyclones and tidal waves that swept the southern coast. New sources indicate the death toll may exceed the half million mark. Individuals and congregations are invited to contribute to the East Pakistan relief fund through regular conference channels or by sending designated contributions directly to Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind., 46514.

James Kratz, associate secretary for Overseas Missions with Mennonite Board of Missions, who has been on an administrative trip to South America since Oct. 11, returned to North America the last of November.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Litwiller arrived in the United States on Nov. 18 from a 2 1/2-month teaching-preaching ministry among the Spanish communities in northern Europe and Spain. Arrangements were made through the Secretary of the Council of Evangelical Churches in Spain for the contacts and assignments the Litwillers had in that country. Their address will again be: Greencroft Villa, 2000 S. 15th Street, Goshen, Ind. 46526.

Mr. and Mrs. Don Brennen, missionaries in Argentina coming home on their first furlough, were scheduled to arrive in North America on Dec. 2 for a three-month furlough. Until Dec. 18 their address is 1309 S. 15th St., Goshen, Ind. 46514. Then 319 Crawford St., Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Gladys Widmer, Bayamon, Puerto Rico, reports: "I arrived in Puerto Rico on Nov. 13 after a good flight. (Gladys was on furlough from August to November.) . . . It was good to return and hear encouraging reports of the work there. There have been three baptisms—a teenager and two mothers.

Ed and Irene Weaver were recently granted 15-day visitors' visas for Nigeria. They plan to arrive in time to attend the Nigeria Mennonite Conference, Dec. 10-15. Pray for them as they make this first visit after an absence of 3 1/2 years.

A Home Bible Studies correspondent in Pittsburgh, Pa., wrote recently to Wilbur Hostetler, HBS director in Elkhart, Ind.: "I am finding your 'Mature Person' series to be highly beneficial to my personal need. The content is excellent, and I must express high praise to the author. It embodies day-to-day experiences which all Christians need in order to grow. I hope to enroll in the others you offer as time goes on. I know that I am growing into a mature person by the Lord's guidance." (Author of 'Mature Person' HBS course is Ray Keim, a social worker at Oaklawn Psychiatric Center in Elkhart.)

The estate of Delphia R. Holsinger, Harrisonburg, Va., recently bequested the sum of $1,749.02 to Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., for use in the general mission program as needed.

Mission Investment Loans provide an opportunity for personal investment in the mission program of the Mennonite Church. Six percent interest is paid on investments made for three years or longer (or payment on demand at five percent). A number of different projects are available. For more information call or write David C. Leaetherman, treasurer, Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Regarding Brother Smedes’ article on abortion in the Nov. 3 Gospel Herald. I get very upset when people profess such profound concern for the preservation of the life of a fetus which no one is sure whether it is human or not, while at the same time they do nothing to save the lives of the clearly human drug addicts or alcoholics who die by the scores in the large cities. I have to wonder about people who fight for the preservation of an unwanted American fetus while they continue to pay for the death of desperately wanted Oriental children. — Doug Hostetter, New York, N.Y.

Re: ‘Items and Comments’ Gospel Herald, Vol. LXIII, Number 39 Paragraphs concerning Famous Writers School. I feel I need to add my experience to balance the news item.

When I signed the contract in 1967 for the course at the cost of $600, I was well aware of the ‘no refund’ clause. The salesman was anything but high-pressure, insisting that I read all the print and consider several days.

Each lesson was individually graded with comments and attachments in a separate personal letter. When I wrote that several moves and other circumstances had set me behind schedule and I didn’t know if could finish in the average, maximum (according to contract) three years, I was given a year’s extension without additional charge.

You can see for yourself how unprofitable it would be both for the student and school to draw out the course to five or ten years or to have it transferable.

Having been treated so fairly and justly, I felt I needed to write a defense. As to the ‘enchantment,’ it probably exists in the mind of the signer. FWS tells each student they will not market manuscripts but they do give us guidelines to know how to market our manuscripts ourselves. — Dorothy L. Stover, Helena, Ala.

The Christmas Thank Offering

By Marion Preheim

In the fall of 1969 our pastor and church elders began talking about how our congregation could have a world vision of Christmas. They thought of a number of persons who had done work overseas. In talking with them several other persons were thought of who had been refugees in Europe.

At first it was thought to give one person a few minutes to talk on Sunday morning. As the idea grew, however, three persons were finally asked to talk on what Christmas meant to them in an overseas setting.

Then the Stewardship Committee was asked to think about our giving at Christmas time. They came up with several ideas to present.

Finally, the whole morning worship service became an expression of the receiving-giving love of Christmas.

Mrs. Hans Peter Neufeld told what her Christmas had meant as a World War II refugee in Europe. "Just prior to Christmas," she said, "my four-year-old sister died of starvation. Grandma kept repeating to us that we should believe and not lose faith. Our faith was very low. They had buried my sister behind rather than in a beautiful cemetery. We had found out that only criminals and outcasts were buried there.

"I could not understand why a girl of four should be buried there. I would get annoyed with Grandma because she would say, 'We should thank God for what we have.'

"I would say, 'How can we thank God when we don't have anything? We don't have a father, a country, food, no decent clothes. We are outcasts everywhere.'

"She replied, 'That doesn't matter. What matters is what God thinks. He'll take care of it.'

"But Christmas was coming. We knew we wouldn't get anything. We hadn't gotten anything for years. Before bedtime on Christmas, Grandma said, 'We must pray.'

"I said, 'But we won't get anything.'

"Grandma said, 'Put your Christmas plates out anyway.'

"I said, 'You're just an old witch. You're just teasing me.'

"We put the plates out. When we woke up in the morning, we had an orange and some hard candy. My mother had saved a little from her earnings to buy the things for our plates. On top of that, we each had a pair of gloves.

"I said, 'Grandma, there is a God!'

"She said, 'I always told you so.'

"When we went outside to play in the snow that afternoon, I put my gloves in my pocket because I did not want to get them wet. I made the orange last a whole week, eating only one section at a time.

"Two or three weeks after Christmas I realized that Grandma was not wearing her sweater anymore. Then I thought that the gloves were the same color as her old sweater. She had taken it apart and knitted us children each a pair of mittens. She suffered from cold the rest of the winter.'"

After Mrs. Neufeld spoke, Nick Kampen told about his experience. Nick, now working at the MCC Clothing Center, was also a World War II refugee.

"We entered a village one time in what is now Poland, but was part of Germany then," he said. "It was real cold. My feet were frozen. Some people took us in. They treated us like we were one of them. They did not know us at all. Perhaps we were their 'enemies,' but they didn't treat us that way.

"I can remember we had a whole pot of potatoes which was a rarity. That really stuck in my mind. Those people saw our plight, that we suffered a great deal, and they were eager to help us. As I think back now, Christ was near to us through those people. He showed His love to us through them.

"Then there was also the time later when we were in Paraguay. In one of the first years in Paraguay, I received a Christmas bundle. I was about eight or nine years old then. This really meant a lot to me. The shirt and trousers I wore, but the whole family shared the other things. We all used that one towel. There was a pack of marbles. I had a brother. Of course, the marbles belonged to both of us.'

After the two who had received help overseas spoke, Mrs. Peter Dyck spoke as one who had been an MCC worker in Europe following World War II.

"An MCC worker is neither a giver nor a receiver. He passes on the gifts. On the other hand, he does not act as a pipeline either. He is a person and a Christian. It is very important, yet very difficult, to give in the right manner.

"Being born in Russia, thus having the same background and language as the people we were serving, helped a great deal in our work with the Mennonite refugees. In listening to their many stories of hardship, loss, and separation, we constantly had to be on guard against becoming too emotionally involved.

"There were frustrations, of course. For example, we were once called to Berlin to work specifically with Menno-nute refugees. Other organizations were supposed to take care of the rest. Consequently, we had a camp for Mennonites only. At mealtime other hungry people were at the door begging for food. We well knew that to give to a few at the door today would result in many hundreds at our door tomorrow, and we had barely enough to feed those entrusted to us in the camp.

"When making up refugee transports, again we were confined to Mennonites. Others, desperately looking for a new home and a new beginning, had to be refused.

"When one of our refugee ships developed engine trouble, had a mutinous drunken crew, and drifted for several days and nights on the high seas, we did not always feel God's nearness.

"But the frustrations were few compared to the many blessings. There were momentary anxieties that made us appreciate God's leading and love all the more. It was a great joy to have had a small part in feeding and clothing the hungry and destitute; in helping to reunite families torn apart by war conditions; in making it possible for those long deprived of spiritual food to again have a Bible and church services, and in helping people to a new home.

"What is it like to see and to feel God at work? It is wonderful."

After the three spoke, a member of the Stewardship Committee talked to the congregation about Christmas being a time to give to others. She told of the Stewardship Committee's idea to have each family take a shoe box and fill it with money. A goal of $100 per family was suggested and that each family think of ways to cut Christmas spending and increase Christmas giving.

The idea caught fire with many. Families began planning how to save. At the Christmas program, many shoe boxes were brought forward. Several children were asked to tell how their family saved money. Some ways that families saved were by eating "poverty" meals, finding extra jobs, cutting down on costly presents, thinking of simple ways to celebrate, and planning simpler vacations in the future.

The offering totaled a little over $2,000, most of which went to the Elkhart Mission Board. $400 was earmarked for local use: for school children's shoes, legal fees, medical aid, and groceries for lower-income families.

Jesus said, “What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind? . . . A man clothed in soft raiment? . . . A prophet” (Mt. 11:7-9)

We see in life largely what we look for. The real difference between many people is this difference of outlook. One man looking on a beautiful scenery can sum it up from an altogether different perspective than another. So Jesus says that character and disposition can damage and make our vision defective.

Jesus suggests three ways of looking at life. First is the fatalistic way. “A reed shaken with the wind.” Life is standing in the muck where chance has placed it, powerless to oppose the powers which sway it to and fro, caught in the vagrant winds of heredity and circumstance.

Men can also view life from the materialistic side. “A man clothed in soft raiment.” How common and popular this is. The man with the fine clothes and plenty of possessions is envied. Cash not character determines human worth.

Then there is the spiritual viewpoint. “A prophet?” A prophet looks at life through God’s eyes. He sees the evidence of God’s presence and revelation of His will. Life is a trust from God to be lived for His glory and for the good of others. What do you see? How do you look at life?

To Keep This Peace

By Blanche T. Richardson

Tho nations fight this Christmas Day,
We, in our hearts, sincerely pray,
“God, give us peace!”
And so, this gift I’d bring to you
For Christmas and the New Year thru,
The gift of peace . . .
But not with silver or with gold
Can this great gift be bought or sold,
This gift of peace;

And not by power or by pelf,
But, by the giving of one’s self,
Can we bring peace . . .
God grant you inner peace, and then,
May you go teach your fellowmen
The gift of peace,
And with it take both truth and light,
That men may learn, by love, not might,
To keep this peace.
Brother, Call Me Brother!

In my study of what a Christian brotherhood means, both from a biblical and Anabaptist approach, I have developed rather strong thinking against titles we assume for ourselves and for each other as brothers and sisters in Christ.

A growing use of such designations as Doctor, Reverend, Bishop, and Professor are completely out of keeping with the scriptural concept of the church. The Christian view of the church is that of a brotherhood.

Jesus' words are clear: “Be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ” (Mt. 23:8-10). Jesus goes on to interpret these commands in the following two verses. He is referring to the use of titles. It is clear He is not asking us to refuse to recognize our earthly parents or employers. He is opposing titles which in the church place one above another. We have one Master, even Christ, and we are brethren.

Ordination does not lift a person above his brethren making him spiritually superior. Neither do degrees call for the designation of Doctor or Professor. There is no place for such titles in the church. If we want to be literal in our scriptural interpretation, here is a good place to put it into practice.

Youth's Right to Smoke Pot

Sure, it is right for youth to smoke pot and become addicted to drugs if it is right for parents to smoke cigarettes, drink alcoholic beverages, or become addicted to coffee or tea.

It would be funny, if not so pathetic. Parents who don't have the guts to refuse a social drink of alcohol, offered by business associates, think for some strange reason their son or daughter, with supposedly much less maturity, ought to have the backbone to refuse pot and drugs offered by the gang.

The parent who yields to the social drink and who puffs away at cigarettes has nothing to say if his son or daughter smokes pot or uses drugs.

Recently I saw a cartoon in which mother and father had a bottle of alcohol in one hand and a glass in the other. Their eyes were dim and their noses red. Their son stood in the doorway smoking marijuana. With dismay the parents said, “Don't do it, son, you might become addicted.”

Most young people are not stupid. They see through such hypocrisy. Dave Wilkerson tells how young people come to him telling him how their parents go to bed on pills, wake up on pills, take pills to quiet their nerves, and pills to help them up. Yet they yell at their young people for taking drugs for a good time. Parents take drinks with their friends and puff away on cigarettes which they know are harmful to their body yet yell at their children for smoking pot. Young people like this, even though they smoke pot and use drugs, feel they are using more sense than their parents.

That's the argument of youth. And it sounds rather convincing, I think. What this editorial is saying is that it is impossible to persuade young people of their wrong while engaging in the same kind of wrong ourselves. — D.

What Is Christmas?

Christmas is a time of remembering. It is God remembering His promise to send His Son Jesus to be our Savior. Christmas is our remembering others, our friends and families, our neighbors and those near and far whom we love and care about and at Christmastime remember in a special way — by a card, a note, or a visit.

Christmas is giving. It is God giving His only Son. He could give no more for us. Christmas is our giving to others some small gift because we love them and because we, in doing so, commemorate God's gift to us on that first Christmas. Yes, Christmas is giving with great joy.

Christmas is loving. The Savior who came loved people no matter what their status or color, or slant of their eyes. He is the Savior of all alike. He simply loved — everything and everyone. He taught and lived and died in love. And Christmas is us loving, too — because of Him, like He loves and because His love is placed in our hearts by His Spirit.

Christmas is God with us—Immanuel. Henry Ward Beecher related the story of a Moravian missionary to slaves in the West Indies who found he couldn’t minister to them. After toiling all day in the hot fields they were not ready to listen to one of his rank and station in life. On his own decision he was sold as a slave, to spend his days in the field as one of them. Thus he earned the right to be heard when the time came to tell his message. This gives a glimpse of the great condescension of Christ. God with us.

By Levi Keidel

The Congolese’s flair for innovation and the dramatic makes their Christmas program the religious event of the year.

It is night. Curtains hang on a wire across the church platform specially strung for the occasion. Behind them excited performers fidget; some adjusting others’ flowing robes or bath-towel turbans; others peeking through a curtain crack into black faces packed wall to wall like a layer of beans in a bowl. The action begins:

SCENE ONE: A decrepit man, leaning upon a staff, with an unnaturally long white beard to emphasize his age, lifts a robed arm heavenward and intones majestically, “The Lord Himself shall give you a sign; a woman still a virgin shall become pregnant and bear a son, and shall name Him Immanuel. Who has believed our report? To whom has the Lord revealed His arm? He grew up before Him as a tender plant, and as a root growing from the dry ground; He had no form or prettiness; and when we saw Him, there was no beauty that we should love Him. For we have been given a child; we bore a son. Government shall be upon His shoulder; and His name, shall be called: The One Who Causes Them to Wonder, the Counsellor, the God of Might, the Father of Eternity, the Prince of Peace.”

SCENE TWO: On stage center sits an attractive well-dressed teenage girl. Enter stage right a white-robed angel with insecurely fastened wings that glisten. The girl starts with fear. The angel lifts both arms and pronounces that the girl is to become pregnant by the Spirit of God. The girl says, “I am the Lord’s slave; the affair be as He wills.”

SCENE THREE: Elizabeth, obviously old and obviously pregnant, blesses Mary; and Mary praises the Lord.

SCENE FOUR: Joseph paces the floor, gesturing vigorously to emphasize his distraction and rage. “Why should this happen to me? Her parents assured me she was a virtuous girl. I paid a high bride price for her. Now who has ruined her? How could she love another man? She is no longer of value to me. I’m returning her to her parents.” He lies down to sleep. An angel arouses him. He sits bolt upright in terror, and hears a message which changes his mind.

Levi Keidel, Elbing, Kan., served for years as a literature missionary in the Congo.
SCENE FIVE: There is a distracting noise to the rear of the church. Heads turn to see a man standing on a ladder to light a candle inside a paper lantern each of its four sides with a star-shaped window. The flickering star begins its long journey on a wire stretched toward the stage.

Enter from the rear three wise men. They wear colorful robes, construction paper crowns, and lean wearily on walking staves. Shading their eyes with their hands, they scan the heavens, looking this way and that. Then one of them sees the moving star, and quickly calls the attention of the others. They watch it in rapt fascination.

Then the star’s motion becomes erratic. It jiggles and swings, as relentless pulling tries to dislodge it from a rough place in the wire. The audience watches breathlessly. A firm tug, the lantern pitches, the candle falls sideways, the flame catches one side of the paper enclosure, filling the air with an uncanny odor, and then goes out. The wise men watch this phenomenon with unruffled fascination, and reverently follow the dead star until it passes over the curtain wire.

SCENE SIX: King Herod sits enthroned flanked by attendants. The wise men arrive and ask where they can find the newly born King of the Jews. Herod cannot believe his ears. When he becomes convinced that the wise men are serious, he flails the air and screams in jealous rage that there will never be a king other than himself.

After suitably venting his anger, three laden soldiers enter with a large scroll. They meticulously peruse the scroll with their fingertips; finally their countenances lighten with discovery, and they announce to all that the baby will be found in Bethlehem. Herod makes the wise men promise that they will come tell him what they find.

SCENE SEVEN: Joseph, and his wife Mary (obviously great with child) stand beside a sleeping innkeeper. He gently clears his throat to rouse him. Then with great reticence and humility, he shows him Mary’s pitiful condition and begs a place for her. The innkeeper unleashes a virulently volley of offenses for their having disturbed him at such an hour, and sends them to the cow stall.

SCENE EIGHT: Poorly dressed boys with shepherd staves lie carelessly scattered around the stage in sleep. Offstage children mimic the bleating of sheep. Suddenly an angel with its attendants enters from one side and says “Fear not.” The shepherds suddenly awaken and assume various postures of frozen terror. The heavenly visitors tell them of the birth of a Savior and where He is to be found.

SCENE NINE: Mary sits beside a straw-filled manger. Joseph standing at her side. Enter the shepherds, who gaze in wonder at the manger, and bow beside it to worship. Enter their sheep; small children on all fours, with appropriate bleating, curiously investigating the underside of the manger, strange feet, and corners of the stage. Enter the wise men; each in turn reverently looks into the manger, places at its legs his gift, and bows in worship.

SCENE TEN: Joseph and Mary with a small bundle between them, are sleeping peacefully. An angel rushes in from one side, kicks Joseph in the ribs and orders him to arise and flee with the mother and child immediately; Herod is coming to kill the village’s babies. Joseph arouses Mary; she picks up the bundle and they hurriedly leave.

SCENE ELEVEN: The curtains open onto a scene of pandemonium. Herod, to one side, is shouting orders to men wearing scavenged pieces of military uniforms who apparently are soldiers. Some carry long-handled brooms beneath their armpits. Soldiers tear babies from the clutching arms of screaming mothers and toss them onto a pile on stage front and center. Soldiers point broomsticks at the infants, and open fire with the mimicked ra-ta-ta-ta of machine guns. Mothers scream in terror, and the curtain closes.

SCENE TWELVE: Justice could never allow such a scene to pass unavenged. Matthew 2 speaks of King Herod; Acts 12 speaks of King Herod. Herod is seated at his work desk, making pronouncements to messengers and signing decrees with due pomp and authority.

Suddenly Herod grips his abdomen and screams out in terror and pain. His chair tips over backward; messengers rush to catch it and lay him prostrate on the floor. He dies in agony, his insides eaten by worms. The curtain falls.

While this annual entertaining event carries no admission fee, most of those leaving still feel they have a debt to pay. They will be back on Christmas morning bringing their fees: gifts of money, chickens, manioc, cloth, pigeons . . . gifts of joy offered to the Christ child on this His birthday.

The Congolese’s celebration of Christmas found what’s important. They’ve found its spirit.

In Defense of Radicalism

By Gerald C. Studer

Am I a soldier of the cross, A foll’wer of the Lamb?
And shall I fear to own His cause, Or blush to speak His name? . . .

Are there no foes for me to face? Must I not stem the flood?
Is this vile world a friend to grace, To help me on to God?

Sure I must fight, if I would reign; Increase my courage,
Lord;
I’ll bear the toil, endure the pain, Supported by Thy Word. . . .

In this hymn Isaac Watts is seriously examining his own life and motives. He is stripping away any layer of pretense and confronting himself with hard questions. He engages in this pursuit as one who is a professing and committed Christian. This is an earnest attempt to face himself with the ultimatum to “Shape up or ship out.”

Isaac Watts wrote this hymn in middle age, when there is a great danger of leveling off in discipleship; of settling down to a comfortable pattern that can only be described as “the status quo.” He is pulling himself up short and challenging his own “life-style.” He is evaluating his practice of Christianity, not his doctrinal convictions.

He is measuring his actions by his words and in stanza three he makes the disconcerting discovery that the world is no different now than it has ever been. It is still the sworn enemy of true righteousness, but he seems to imply that he has gradually and painlessly come to live as though the world was not his enemy but a nominal friend. In stanza four he says in effect, “I’ve got to do better — I can’t continue in this compromising kind of life ’if I would reign,’” and he prays for an increase in courage.

The Apostle Paul gives us a similar glimpse into the innermost sanctum of his life when in Romans 7 he says,

“My own behavior baffles me. For I find myself not doing what I really want to do but doing what I really loathe. . . . I often find that I have the will to do good, but not the power. . . . My conscious mind wholeheartedly endorses the Law, yet I observe an entirely different principle at work in my nature. This is in continual conflict with my conscious attitude, and makes me an unwilling prisoner to the law of sin and death.”

I want to tell you as plainly as I know how of a discovery

I am now in the process of making. It throws a great deal of light for me both on my personal experience and upon my understanding of “life in these United States” — to borrow a phrase from the Reader’s Digest. It is that every Christian individual and group tends to settle at a point below its professed convictions.

No Christian is as good as his testimony. No church is as good as its Confession of Faith. So God’s Spirit periodically upsets the fruit basket. This is the reason that every few generations there is a restlessness and a rebellion against the Establishment that appears to question the status quo’s every facet.

From a period of time when everyone does essentially the same thing there is a reaction in which persons insist on doing their own thing!

Arthur Gish has written a book entitled The New Left and Christian Radicalism that is very stimulating. It is essential for us to see what is happening and to examine ourselves to see how we are responding to it.

Gish says that the new radicalism, whether of a theological or political variety, is an attempt to present a fundamental alternative to the status quo. It means to start with what could be rather than with what is. He suggests that this is caused by the moving of the Spirit in our day. And so he writes to show the humanistic radical, the relevance of theology to social change, and to show the Christians the radical implications of their Christian faith. We shall never understand what is happening or profit from it if we persist in believing that it is simply irresponsible rebellion. There are indeed groups and persons who seem bent on little more, but much of today’s radicalism is not “just to be different” but is rather a remarkably courageous attempt to be faithful and to repudiate hypocrisy.

To be a Christian in fact and not merely in name is to be a radical.

This sounds absurd to many people who are acquainted with the church. The church has long looked and acted more like an “opiate of the people” than a disturber of a sinful peace. The Christian has often been a conservative force who puts his weight behind the status quo. Gish says, “In spite of what many think, Christian faith does not refer to presidential prayer breakfasts . . . or the local church which opposes open housing.” Such a reading of the Scripture is a very selective reading. Indeed it is a distorted one. The Christian faith rather is “good news” for a world in which the afflicted need comforting and the comfortable need to be afflicted. The unfortunate thing is that God cannot depend upon the majority of His followers to do “His thing.” Rather they tend to settle into a state of acceptance of injustices and a support of the status quo. Periodically then God must raise up a few people who will not settle for things as they are but who insist that the claims made by Christians and by the politicians waxing eloquent about this free land are to be realized in fact or else we should die trying. The radical does not accept expediency as a guiding light in determining his course. The radical dares to risk failure. It is not wrong to ask the question of whether one’s action will be effective, but it is wrong to use effectiveness as the criterion for action. Christ died not because it was expedient but because it was the way to defeat sin and the way to resurrection. The radical would rather fail in a cause that will someday win than win in a cause that will ultimately fail.

Gerald C. Studer, pastor of the Scottdale Mennonite Church, Scottdale, Pa., delivered this meditation in Publishing House Chapel, Oct. 29.

The early church did not try to take over the Roman Empire or change it. They simply believed and acted as though it was not the center of history and this attitude threatened the Romans to such an extent that they felt forced to stamp out the church.

The Anabaptists likewise shook the whole of Europe with their attempt to live a new kind of life. This is what the Ruth/Clysteen Martyrs Mirror project is calling us to if we have the eyes to see it. It is one thing to bask in the pride of a great heritage and quite another thing to be as faithful and radical in our day as our forefathers were in theirs. It is very interesting to find Conrad Grebel saying in a letter to Thomas Müntzer in 1524 (recently published by Herald Press), “With us there are not twenty who believe the Word of God.” Yet in three years time there were tens of thousands of Anabaptists in Europe. The Spirit of God had found a mere handful of men ready to take up the radical call, and it turned out that thousands were ready to lay their lives on the line.

Evidence that this manner of life “in Christ” is dawning again may be seen in the cry for the recovery of integrity of church membership that is being heard in many places today, as well as in the de-emphasis upon the Establishment and the professional ministry and the resistance to the draft as a means of buttressing national self-interest by military imperialism.

The superficial marks of radicalism such as hairdo, styles of dress, etc., may be but a distraction from the more fundamental radicalism that is emerging. You may like it or not, but if you want to be where it’s at and be a part of the action, you may find yourself opposing God unless you are willing to look carefully and patiently at what is happening.

At the height of the emergence of Anabaptism there was a bewildering mixture of voices and causes, seventy-seven distinct movements in the Basel area alone! All of these are now nothing but historical relics except those that were indeed fresh movements of God’s Spirit. Try reading your New Testament again with a view to its radicalism, and you will wonder how you ever read it before with a view to its comfort!

Let us pray:

Dear God, we confess our guilt in being content with being Christians and church members on a “business as usual” basis. Help us now to have the courage to be as radical as You have called us to be in our day and in this place, to Your glory, for Jesus’ sake, Amen.

"As I See It"

Readers are urged to submit material on any issue for this column. Maximum of 400 words.

There are voices in the church being raised against the payment of war taxes. Recently in a small group discussion concerning this issue, I was led to think of a possible solution. I believe it was a thought prompted by the Holy Spirit and I submit it as a suggestion to our brotherhood.

There are taxes and taxes. Gasoline tax builds roads, property tax builds schools, city wage tax cleans our streets, but the major part of income tax is war tax. We could limit our incomes so that we could avoid this tax. We could give up to 50 percent of our incomes to charities of our choice. We could live in Voluntary Service or Voluntary Poverty. In our age of affluence, this is a harsh recommendation and may be too costly for many.

I can visualize the college professor accepting only a limited living salary and allowing worthy students to benefit from the balance. For the farmer or the business man, perhaps the arrangement of Stanley Tam as explained in his book, God Owns My Business, may be the way. He turned over his business to God, paying himself a small salary. In this way all the profits were channeled directly into the Lord’s work.

This method of nonpayment of war taxes may not be as spectacular but could be even more costly and significant. “He that is able to receive it, let him receive it” (Mt. 19:12c). — Miriam R. Stoltzfus, Philadelphia, Pa.
Quite some years ago, an older pastor received a complaint about a brother in his church. This pastor very kindly and together with the deacon approached the brother. The brother denied that there had been any wrongdoing whatsoever. The older pastor died. A younger man was installed. Again the continuing problem was brought to the new pastor. Not certain how to approach one older than himself, the young pastor counseled with the deacon and the elders of the congregation.

Since the matter had become a public scandal the brother was again approached. Once more he denied any wrongdoings. But because of all the evidence involved, the brother was publicly disowned by the church. However, the church prayed for this onetime brother and the pastor continued to visit him. After a long time he gave evidence of repentance and was again restored to church fellowship.

This one who had been disciplined became one of the best supporters of the pastor, visiting together, sharing their faith, and praying together. In spite of an unpleasant break during the exercise of discipline, there was a complete reconciliation through repentance. The church and their pastor were truly servants for reconciliation.

Simply stated reconciliation is the restoring of broken relationships. It is a coming to terms with another person. Man’s relationship with God and God’s relationship with man depends not only upon one’s attitude toward God, but also on his attitude toward his neighbor. Jesus said, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.” To violate this command, which means to break any one of the commandments of the moral law, is to break one’s relationship with God.

Adam broke this relationship by simply setting up another god instead of his own Lord God, his Creator. This brought into man’s being the wayfaring spirit. Since that day man has been trying to set up his own gods. This bend toward evil was passed on to the human family as a part of their inheritance. To Cain it meant that he was the possessor of a jealous heart. He expressed the ultimate sin toward Abel his brother. So we can see how the law can be summed up in two words — to love God with the whole being, and to love our neighbor as we do love ourself.

Throughout human history the people of God experienced broken relationships between themselves, and with other peoples. God wanted His people to be the servants for reconciliation to the whole world. But when the God-called people became ingrown and lived only selfishly for themselves, they forgot their mission as servants to the peoples around them. Forgetting this mission, they lost out in their relationships with each other as a people.

If Israel would have attempted to fulfill her mission of being servants for reconciliation to the peoples of the world, instead of crying out “The Temple of the Lord,” their whole history could have been different. Their nation could have been spared from the destructions which they suffered. Even today the Jewish people think of the closing verses of Isaiah 52 and all of chapter 53 as referring to the nation rather than to their Messiah. But in the fullness of time He who was intended to become the Restorer of Relationships came into the world as God’s sent One.

Jesus Came as Servant

“...The Son of Man . . . did not come to be served, but to serve and to give his life to redeem many people” (Mt. 20:28). The life of Jesus was one of constant service to others. On one occasion He said, “Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee,” and added “Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house.” He raised to life the son of the widow of Nain. He gave sight to blind Bartimaeus. He brought the lepers back into society. He fed the multitudes. Through these acts of service He evidenced that He was the promised Messiah.

In His teachings those who were near to Him could understand His role as the Servant of God and man. For He taught them, “Who is greater, the one who sits down to eat or the one who serves him? The one who sits down, of course. But I am among you as one who serves” (Lk. 22:27). We clearly see from these teachings of Jesus that in serving one demonstrates true greatness.

When Jesus washed the feet of His disciples, He showed what it means to be a true reconciling servant. When feetwashing is engaged in with the attitude of reconciliation, brothers who have had differences will meet at the tub and wash each other’s feet. Greeting each other with the holy kiss then takes on new meaning in their lives. They now have kindred spirits and they can talk together as brothers.

When He Laid Down His Life Jesus Became the Real Servant for Reconciliation

Jesus showed Himself to be the true and faithful servant when He laid down His life in death. “He always had the very nature of God, But he did not think that by force he should try to become equal with God. Instead, of his own free will he gave it all up. And took the nature of a servant.

A Servant of Reconciliation

He became like man, he appeared in human likeness; He was humble and walked the path of obedience to death — his death on the cross" (Phil. 2:6-8).*

Truly Jesus did not come to be served, but to serve. He laid down His life to put away our sins from God’s remembrance. He laid down His life to deliver mankind from slavery to a world system. “Christ gave himself for our sins to set us free from this present evil age.” He laid down His life to make friends out of His enemies.

“Through the Son, then, God decided to bring the whole universe back to himself. God made peace through his Son’s death on the cross, and so brought back to himself all things, both on earth and in heaven. . . . But now, by means of the physical death of his Son, God has made you his friends, in order to bring you, holy and pure and innocent, into his presence” (Col. 1:20, 22).*

So reconciliation is a mutual affair. God is reconciled to man by grace, and man is reconciled to God as he turns to God in obedience. A rectified estrangement yields to fellowship. This is reconciliation. Through man’s acceptance of the servant role of Jesus Christ, reconciliation is accomplished.

Jesus Calls His Followers to Become Servants for Reconciliation

2 Corinthians 5:17-20 is God’s call to every Christian to become a servant of His for the reconciliation of mankind. First man must come to terms with God through surrender and obedient faith before he can become a reconciler among men.

Second, one must come to terms with himself. Why has God not endowed me with certain qualities of life and abilities that you have? I must learn to live with myself and to accept the gifts God has given to me. Then I can use these in His program of reconciliation of mankind.

Third, we must come to terms with our brothers. With our peers both within and without the kingdom. With our elders, the generation who have lived before us. And with our juniors, the generation who follows. Such a thing as a generation gap need not be serious, if we can accept ourselves and others. Any person who refuses to come to terms with himself and with others cannot be a servant for reconciliation. It is such a refusal that causes breaks both in the church and in the social order.

Fourth, it is a continuing process. “If we walk in the light as he himself is in the light, then we share together a common life, and we are being cleansed from every sin by the blood of Jesus his Son” (1 Jn. 1:7). Reconciliation with our brother is a never-ending task.

Fifth, when we have come to terms with our Lord, we live in a new world. “When anyone is united to Christ, there is a new world; the old order has gone, and a new order has already begun” (2 Cor. 5:17). It is the life of unselfish living. “If anyone wishes to be a follower of mine, he must leave self behind; day after day he must take up his cross, and come with me” (Lk. 9:23). In the new world of the reconciler, he finds himself living each day under the cross. That which is vulgar is foreign to the Christian reconciler. His life is motivated by the spiritual graces which attract men to Jesus Christ. When he expresses the love and the joy and the peace and the hope of Christian faith, he can really be God’s reconciling agent among mankind.

Sixth, there is a message of faith to be given to a world of people who are living outside of the fellowship with Jesus Christ. Early one morning, my wife and I picked up two hitchhikers who were traveling east on the turnpike. They both had the long hair and the bearded faces that is characteristic of the ‘new generation.’ As they rode with us we began to share our Christian faith. These fellows freely shared who they were and where they had come from. They said they had requested rides from dozens of persons during the night and were turned down by everyone. They thought this couple was different. We suggested that drivers are fearful because of all that has happened to those who pick up hitchhikers. They replied that they think young persons are harmless!

God Wants His Church to Be the Servant for Reconciliation

Israel failed to be God’s reconciling ministers in the world of the nations. In too many cases the church has also failed. Too many young persons say, “We do want Jesus Christ, but the church you can have.” This failure on the part of the church to be God’s reconcilers among mankind is a sad reality.

But when the church puts her blessing upon war and militarism and encourages her youth to participate in these, and when the church turns away from human needs of all kinds in our society, it is to be expected that it will also lose its appeal to thinking people. God wants His church to be reconcilers. This means that He intends this for every Christian and this means you!

Reconciliation—
The Business of Getting Together

By Robert Hartzler

Disagreement, estrangement, and alienation are all very real and very common ingredients to life in our day. Newspapers and television sets pour out a constant description of broken relationships. Our own experience is full of tension and disagreement. Life seems to have a natural tendency toward brokenness and alienation. Broken relationship is both an ancient and a modern reality, as old as Adam and as new as you and I.

There is a solution. I offer three examples—Jacob (2000 BC), the Prodigal (AD 33), and myself (1970).

Jacob was a man who spent a large segment of his life alienated from his twin brother Esau. He took advantage of his brother’s stomach to cheat him out of what was rightfully his. Jacob’s deception contributed to Esau’s passionate hatred and life together became an impossibility. So Jacob went to live with his uncle Laban away from the parental home for twenty years. Eventually Jacob began to think about going back home. Esau responded to a friendly letter with an army of 400 men. In fear and anxiety Jacob wrestled a whole night in prayer with God until finally in the morning light he found the peace and determination to go on to meet his alienated brother regardless of what it meant for the future. But when Esau saw his brother Jacob who had been gone for some twenty years, instead of pouring out his hostility and anger he welcomed him as a brother. They embraced, were reconciled, and were friends the rest of their lives.

The Prodigal of Luke 15 was ungrateful, selfish, and stubborn. He wanted what he had coming right now. Demanding his inheritance he went out to waste it on wine and loose women. When he came to the end of his money and himself, he realized that there was only one place to go that made any sense at all. And that was back to the father whom he had wronged. So he did. He did the thing that is often most difficult to do—retracing the steps to the feet of the one he had violated. But instead of vindictive punishment the father offered forgiving love. Instead of a cold stare it was a kiss of tears. Instead of hard labor, feasting and dancing. They were reconciled!

I am happy to be able to say humbly and honestly that I have no enemies. That is, I have never had a disagreement with another person which resulted in an unresolved separation. But, I must confess that the deepest feelings of anger, frustration, and resentment that I have ever experienced have been toward a brother in the church. I am happy to report that he and I are currently talking and working on this matter and progress is being made. We anticipate a complete reconciliation.

What is reconciliation? Quite simply, it is getting back to—gether again. On a human level reconciliation speaks of a new stage in personal relationships in which previous hostility or estrangement has been put away in some decisive act. Theologically speaking, reconciliation describes changed relations between God and man which are the result of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

It is a work of God. All of us know by experience that hostile individuals do not die for each other. They die because of each other. Human hostility is largely a negative force. It wills the destruction and death of its object. Hostile parties in Vietnam and American streets gun each other down by the thousands. By contrast, God offers reconciliation to men who are yet engaged in hostile activity. The testimony of Romans 5 and Ephesians 2 is that God desires to bring us back to Himself even while we are bombarding Him with the evidences of our hostility. It is God's design to bring the whole universe back into good relations with Himself. Colossians 1:20. This plan stretches to include everything from the brightest sun of the most remote galaxy to the most simple form of matter man can comprehend. It also includes everything between these two extremes — including you and me as persons, and everyone else who ever experiences life.

It is God who effects reconciliation between individual men and women. As humans without God, we lack the needed resources to overcome personal hostility and alienation. Some men manage a standoff, a balance of power, a draw which allows them to function in spite of each other, but this is a far cry from genuine reconciliation. Real reconciliation is a work of God.

The source of reconciliation is the love of God. In Ephesians 2:8 Paul underscores the reality of God's grace on our behalf. Jacob was dependent upon Esau's love. The prodigal's only hope was the father's acceptance. My reconciliation with my brother hinges upon his love and acceptance for me. God's love makes getting back together, a possibility. Christians worthy of the name are able to reconcile and be reconciled easier than non-Christians. We who have experienced the love and acceptance of God are more sensitive and responsive to the similar needs of others. John says that we may test our experience of God's love for us by the reality of our love for the brother.

I emphasize reconciliation as an act rather than a process. It's a big word. It sounds like a long detailed process that takes much time and effort and string-pulling. To the contrary, reconciliation is a decisive act. For Christians the act was the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and is the making of ourselves vulnerable as Christ did in the interests of getting back together. God took a terrible risk in becoming a dying man. He risked the rejection of a humanity steeped in sin and selfishness. But He was willing to take that risk because of His love and hope for a new stage of relationship.

A man takes a risk when he proposes marriage to a woman. But He is willing to take that risk because of His love for her and because he sees the possibility of a new stage of relationship with her in marriage. He goes out on a limb for the sake of better relations. It is his decisive act that opens the door to deeper and increased relationship.

Jacob sent Esau a message. The prodigal approached the parental home. So we must act decisively if we are to experience and promote reconciliation. We must allow ourselves to become vulnerable. We must take the initiative in overcoming alienation, noncommunication, and estrangement. It is the risk that breaks the impasse to destroy the sterile balance of power. My experience has been that when I am willing to take the initiative more often than not the dam is broken and all those emotions, sentiments, and feelings that were captive to selfish pride are released to become the basis of the new stage of relationship.

Reconciliation is never one-sided but mutual. Two thousand years ago God's decisive act of reconciliation in Jesus Christ was done. Yet many individuals in our world are far from any positive relationship to God. Why? Simply because they have not responded to God's invitation to reconciliation. The father has forgiven the prodigal. But the son never knows the joy of that forgiveness until he comes home to experience it, to see the tears of joy, and to feel the arms of reassurance around his neck.

Perhaps you have been wronged. You claim innocence by declaring that you hold no grudge. Alienation and noncommunication remain. You have an obligation regardless of who is at fault. Your gift at the altar is insignificant as long as the brother is alienated. Matthew 5:23.

Reconciliation allows sanctification. The Holy Spirit cannot really deal with the shady areas of our lives until we deal with obvious cases of alienation, personal grudges, and hostility. But, when we become honest with ourselves, with God, and with the brethren to deal with the unreconciled areas of our lives of which we are aware, then the Spirit of God can move in to bring other stains and blemishes to our consciousness.

Reconciliation brings results. Perhaps the greatest result is our own personal growth. Alienation cuts us off from God and our fellows. Reconciliation gets us back together on a new plane of relationship. I submit that this is our business as followers of Christ. With Paul our message is, We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled.

_Hans Herr_, a monograph including an art print of the watercolor painting by Andrew Wyeth of the Bishop's 1719 house, has been published by the Lancaster Mennonite Conference Historical Society of 2215 Mill Stream Road, Lancaster, Pa. 17602. It sells for $3.00 per copy. (Pa. residents add $2.50 sales tax for each copy ordered) and is mailed first class to insure prompt arrival. This publication is a part of a broader program to restore the Hans Herr house recently purchased by the Society from the Huber family. The full color reproduction of the painting is a limited edition and is not available in quantity for resale.

The distinguished American contemporary artist, Andrew Wyeth, is himself a descendant of Bishop Hans Herr. The print, bound in with the pages of this booklet, may be removed and is suitable for framing. It measures 11 by 8 1/2 inches.

J. C. Wenger, also a descendant of the subject, Hans Herr, has written the 10-page essay entitled, "The Lancaster Mennonite Patriarch." It is an eminently readable and factual account of this early Mennonite leader's life and work.

The booklet is further enhanced by photographs of Hans Herr, a doorway of the house, the stairway, and the huge fireplace. This is an excellent gift item for friends and children/grandchildren. — Gerald C. Studer

Facsimile reproductions of two letters written by Conrad Grebel in 1524 on behalf of the then emerging Swiss Brethren movement are now available for the first time to the general reader along with a careful transcription and translation of the same by J. C. Wenger. The originals of these important letters, two of the seventy Grebel letters known to be in existence, are preserved with the Vadian collection in Sankt Gallen, Eastern Switzerland. This work will become a collector's item.

Published under the title, _Conrad Grebel's Programmatic Letters of 1524_, these letters are key documents in our understanding of the type of believers' fellowship the youthful early leaders of the Anabaptist movement envisioned. The two letters were written by Grebel for the persecuted Swiss brethren to the German reformer, Thomas Müntzer.

The letters reinforce the tradition handed down that Grebel and the early Anabaptists were anxious to establish and maintain a believers' church based solely on biblical principles (the letters constantly warn against man-made additions and alterations); a Lord's Supper following the explicit directions of Christ; a simple meetinghouse rather than an elaborate environment in which the veneration of objects could so easily replace true worship; brotherly admonition and a believers' fellowship as opposed to the "people's church" idea; a nonresistant movement which viewed all wars as the God-directed conquering of the Promised Land as an unnecessary plague; an adult baptism based on Christ's teachings on binding and loosing (and the rejection of children's baptism as a senseless blasphemous abomination contrary to all Scripture). Both letters end with the realization that a fiercer persecution of the young believers' church is just around the corner.

The book, in a handsome horizontal format and printed in a deep Van Dyck brown, is a bibliophile's treasure and a major contribution to the understanding of our Anabaptist origins. J. C. Wenger has done the church a great service in making the documents accessible. The book is dedicated to Hans Gudolf von Grebel, thirteenth generation lineal descendant of Conrad Grebel. He is the Dekan of the Zürich Grossmünster, pastor of the same church in which Zwingli lashed out against the Swiss brethren over 400 years ago. It does seem strange, but recently a Swiss Reformed professor extended his hand to me, a Mennonite, and asked forgiveness for the two and a half centuries of violence and abuse his forefathers had bestowed on ours. Through study he was well aware of this. Therefore I am glad that Brother Wenger publicly showed this forgiveness by dedicating his book to one of Zwingli's successors. Reading Conrad's letters again it appears to me that he, a firm believer in nonresistance, would agree with the gesture.

_Conrad Grebel's Programmatic Letters of 1524_, published by Herald Press, was released June 6, 1970. — Jan Gleysteen

"With refreshing honesty and bluntness, Mr. Franke peels away the layers of apathy and phoniness and offers creative answers to the probing questions lurking in the minds of people today. . . . This is not a book about religion but a discussion of life. . . ." This quote from the cover of the book is not exaggerated. His comprehension of present-day problems does not lead him to offer a "social gospel" as the answer. He is evangelical in his message with a deep social concern. His quote of E. Stanley Jones would clarify his conviction: "An individual Gospel without a social Gospel is a soul without a body, and a social Gospel without an individual Gospel is a body without a soul. One is a ghost and the other is a corpse; you can take your choice."

If you agree with the author that "we have the assets — what it takes to put life in order — but they have been frozen by the coldness of indifference, carelessness, neglect, selfishness, and the secular mood," then by all means read the entire book. He will help you "defrost your frozen assets." — Norman Derstine.

Here is a small volume that will surprise you. I must confess I approached it with the attitude, "What of real significance and value on First Corinthians Thirty can be said in a mere 47 pages, pages well sprinkled with illustrations?" The discovery was a profitable one.

The author has much to say about love. He defines love as "an active concern for the good of another person." He further insists that the "New Testament interprets love as an attitude, a way of relating and acting with other people." It is not that the Christian is sent forth with the order to "love" everybody. He is called first of all to receive the fullness of God's love into his own life, and then give forth this love to others.

We must grow both in the ability to receive and in the ability to give. This growth results from the working of the Spirit of God for love is a gift of the Spirit. If we find ourselves in a situation in which it is difficult to love, we are to remember that our first obligation is to receive the love God offers us. Having received of God's love, we have then something to give. Finally, he takes the characteristics of love, (vs. 4-8a), suggesting that we use these characteristics as an evaluation of our own Christian experience and expression. The reader that accepts the author's challenge will realize that he has much homework left to do. An excellent selection for church libraries. — Richard Tschetter.

NEw LIFE FOR OLD?

What does it mean to have the Church sharing with you when your heart is on the table beside you and a skilled surgeon is repairing it with a vein from your leg?

One Pennsylvania woman knows the answer. She lets Lois Rensberger tell about it in the January, 1971, issue of SHARING.

POCKETBOOK PASTOR!

Who rates next to the President with a U.S. cabinet aide when it comes to discussing the needs of the Middle East? Who feels the Christian who is 'called' to stay at home can make a big difference in the life of the Church by the way he handles his possessions? The clues are in HARRY MARTENS: Pocketbook Pastor by Maggie Glick in January SHARING.

Don't miss these vibrant mutual aid stories coming to your mailbox soon (if you're a member of a Mennonite Mutual Aid Association health plan. If you're not, why not speak to your MMA representative or pastor, or write for a copy?)

Also coming in January SHARING:

THEY STOOD IN LINE - A church story from south central Pennsylvania.

"WE DON'T FEEL WORTHY" - The experience of a pastor in Virginia.
A church executive said that the time is ripe for organizing "new communities of faith" that fit the needs of the times.

"Some will be house churches, some will have only part-time leadership, and some no professional leadership at all," said Dr. Otis E. Young, "but congregations there must be."

Dr. Young, an official of the United Church of Christ's Board for Homeland Ministries, said the interest in such things as witchcraft, tarot cards, and the "human potential" movement are manifestations of a search for transcendence.

Speaking at the board's annual meeting, the head of its church extension division called on the church to determine how it can "embrace this spiritual renaissance without crushing it, how to enrich it without polluting it, how to deepen it without mutilating it."

While the main line denominations are having trouble organizing new churches and attracting members, he said, increasing numbers of people, particularly the young, are finding "religious" experiences in a "booming cult of antireligion."

"More and more Americans of all backgrounds are buying the notion that rationality has had it, that conventional reasoning is a bore and a chore," said Dr. Young. "The truth resides, it seems, in your thighs in your blood, in your viscera and your stars, but not in reason."

The "human potential" movement, with its emphasis on such things as sensors awareness and meditation, is a "kind of middle and upper-class Pentecostalism," he said.

"And the Pentecostal movement itself continues to grow," he added, "while other Protestant denominations stand still or get smaller."

"Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)" is the tentative name for a proposed merger of the nation's two largest Presbyterian denominations.

The suggested name was disclosed by a joint committee on reunion representing the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (Southern).

Members of the committee reported that a plan of union will be submitted to the General Assemblies of both churches in the Spring of 1971. Assemblies will be asked to accept the draft for study and reaction by presbyteries (regional units) and congregations.

An initial vote on the merger is anticipated by Assemblies in 1972. If approved, the plan would then go to presbyteries for action.

The two denominations have been separated for more than 100 years, a split arising partly from issues involved in the Civil War. An attempt at union failed in 1954. Current negotiations were launched in 1969.

College students and officials of the Baptist General Convention of Texas locked horns on "liquor by the drink," with the young people holding the issue as secondary to war and racism.

The encounter between some 40 students and four convention officers during a two-hour freewheeling dialogue which almost did not happen because of fears that it might "get out of hand."

Only a handful of the messengers attended the dialogue. Student questions to the officials were at first cordial but became increasingly blunt. The young people asked why the Baptists had not come out against the Vietnam War, for selective conscientious objection to military service, and for the inclusion of more minority representatives at decision-making levels.

Slovak authorities have ordered a halt to construction work on churches, the Bratislava newspaper, Pravda, has reported.

It said the order followed a "church building mania" in recent years. Some $7 million were collected through donations from individual and collective farms for church construction, Pravda said.

According to reports reaching Vienna, Slovak authorities said church building projects should be "readjusted for other use," as kindergartens or fire depots. They ordered a ban on all further collections and said no new churches will be allowed built.

Father Robert F. Drinan, SJ, professing a "politics of peace and reconciliation," became the first Roman Catholic priest ever elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. He squeaked by in the Nov. 3 general elections with a margin of 3,000 votes in Massachusetts' Third Congressional district race.

Father Drinan compiled a total of 63,863 votes to edge his Republican opponent, State Rep. John McGlennon of Concord, who recorded 60,755 votes.

Father Drinan, who resigned his post as dean of the Boston College Law School on the day of his Congressional victory, told Religious News Service that the election of a priest to Congress "may mean that people are looking for moral leadership.

The voters knew who I was and what I was and, and maybe they see me as a good influence in the Congress."

The 42-year-old Jesuit also said following his victory that the "result of the election means that voters in Massachusetts have repudiated three things — the war policy of President Nixon, the economic policies of the Republican Party, and the campaign tactics of 'smear' and 'fear' that we have seen so much of this year."

More than 10 percent of the nation's TV stations have reported that they will continue airing public service anti-smoking "spots" of the American Cancer Society after broadcast cigarette advertising ends on Jan. 2.

William B. Lewis, chairman of the Cancer Society, reported that more than 100 TV executives representing 141 outlets have made their plans known in reply to a query sent to nearly 600 TV stations in the U.S.

Of those responding, 99 said they would continue the anti-cigarette messages, 17 said they would not, and 25 were undecided.

Mr. Lewis told the 57th annual meeting of the Cancer Society that he was delighted that the response had been so favorable.

The inscription on a New York City courthouse reads: "The true administration of justice is the firmest pillar of good government."

The pillar, however, is a shaky one. Antiquated procedures, lack of space and facilities, and a growing number of arrests all keep court docket crowded and prisons overflowing. As of last month, city jails even held men who had been waiting trial for over two years.

The National Safety Council's current advertising campaign on radio, television, and in the print media urges the American public to "Scream Bloody Murder" and write to the Council to find out what can be done to get drunk drivers off the road.

Those who do write are sent the booklet, "Getting the Alcohol Story to the People." The booklet explains what is involved in the drinking problem and tells how concerned citizens can work at the local level to encourage strong laws against drinking drivers and to improve law enforcement and adjudication efforts aimed at ridding the nation's highways of this menace.
Spend a Year in Europe

Persons interested in exploring the possibilities of a year abroad in the Mennonite Central Committee's trainee program should be making their initial inquiries now.

The Trainees-to-Europe program is administered by the Intermenno Trainee Committees in Germany and the Netherlands. MCC assists in the preparation of participants. The program began in 1963 as one channel of cooperation between European Mennonites and MCC. This represented a new dimension to the MCC trainee program which was begun in 1950 when 21 young men from Mennonite communities in Europe came to spend a year on American farms. The first group of 16 trainees from North America went to Germany, Switzerland, and Luxembourg in the fall of 1963. The Netherlands and France have been added to the list of receiving countries.

It is hoped that the trainees taking part in the program will return home at the end of one year with new experiences and impressions, with new encounters and contacts, and with broadened horizons; and that they will work with conviction and devotion toward the promotion of a strong Christian brotherhood and better international understanding.

Applications should be submitted no later than Jan. 31, 1971, to: Trainee Program, Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa. 17501.

Trainees leave for Europe in August or September. The Intermenno Trainee Committee will take each individual's interests, training, and skill into account as much as possible when arranging placements. Among the work possibilities are: various kinds of farming, floriculture, factory work, construction work (housing, roads, waterworks) including architectural drawings, office work, household work in families or institutions with children.

Each trainee will receive the equivalent of $10 a month as pocket money. Room, board, and some insurance will also be provided. The Intermenno Trainee Committee is responsible for international travel and the necessary inland travel in Europe. The trainee is expected to pay his preparatory expenses and the trip from home to the port of departure (usually New York) via Akron. Vacation time is allowed in Europe but vacation trips are at personal expense.

An applicant for the Intermenno Trainee Program should be:

- between 19 and 30 years old and possess a reasonable degree of maturity
- physically and mentally healthy
- a good representative of his home church and able to give a fair interpretation of his church to the European people
- ready to place the policies and goals of the program above personal plans and wishes
- willing to stay with a Mennonite family or institution selected for him by the Intermenno Trainee Committee
- willing to work in the business or household of the sponsors
- prepared to study the language of the assigned country before leaving and while in Europe
- willing to return home with the trainee group at the end of the one year
- willing to conform to the regulations of the Intermenno Trainee Committee

Zehr Speaks to Evangelicals on War and Peace

Howard J. Zehr, Executive Secretary of Mennonite General Conference, was present with a unique challenge in connection with attendance at the Southwest Mennonite Conference. The Evangelical Ministers' Association of the Greater Phoenix Area, upon learning of plans for him to be in the area, invited him to speak to them in their regular meeting of the association on "War and Peace, The View of a Christian Pacifist." This was a luncheon meeting held in a local cafeteria. Zehr made the presentation in the form of a personal testimony and conviction. He spoke of the concept being viewed as based upon the very heart of the gospel. He showed the distinction between the position of a nonresistant Christian and a humanistic or liberal pacifist, and concluded by stating the nature of his own personal commitment.

A reacting panel consisting of an army chaplain, a Bible church pastor, a Friends pastor, and Mennonite Pastor Theron Weldy discussed the issues involved. A vigorous discussion followed with an unusual sense of openness and appreciation.

One attendant at the meeting wrote to a local Mennonite pastor immediately following the occasion. He wrote that he doesn't remember a time when he spent a more exciting hour wanting so much to preach but had to remain quiet. He then stated, "Seeing you Mennonites speaking so calmly of something you believe in so passionately almost made me wish I were a Mennonite."

Lambrights Complete Term in Medical Missions

Warren and Janice (Hartzler) Lambright recently completed a three-year term of missionary service at Evangelical Presbyterian Hospital in Addidome, Ghana. Lambright is originally from Middlebury, Ind., and his wife comes from Eureka, Ill. They have a 21-month-old son, Eric.

The Lambrights, appointed to Ghana by Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, were loaned to the United Church Board for World Missions for medical missionary service in Addidome, 90 miles northwest of Accra. The Evangelical Presbyterian Hospital, opened in 1955 with a 70-bed capacity, has expanded to 112 beds with a tuberculosis ward and serves approximately 100,000 people in a 40-mile radius. The staff is Ghanaian except for the Lambrights and another doctor and his wife.

Of the 2,500-2,800 outpatients treated monthly, one third have not previously visited the hospital.

Eleven maternal child clinics supervised by Mrs. Lambright, a registered nurse, were held monthly in the various villages. Community health nurses are continuing these clinics.

Lambright characterized their term as one in which they could demonstrate "the spirit and love of Christ, helping people overcome fear of spirits and develop a Christian way of life."

According to Lambright, the spirit world for many Ghanaians is one with the physical world. Many people live in fear of harm from the spirits, of evil returning, of juju spells being cast on them, he said. Many are treated by fetish priests to cast out the witches, spells, and evil. Fetish priests, however, are not necessarily hostile to medical care.

Lambright plans to return to his alma mater, Jefferson Medical School in Philadelphia, Pa., in February 1971 for training in internal medicine. The family's current address is c/o Clarence Lambright, R. 1, Middlebury, Ind. 46540.

Miss Anni Dueck, Fernheim, Paraguay, three-year Bible course. Mr. Ernest Weichselberger, Volendam, Paraguay, graduated with Bachelor in Christian Education. He will be teaching and working in the church in Volendam, Paraguay.

Graduation exercises were held on Nov. 8. Pastor Juan Regehr, Friesland, Paraguay, led the opening invocation, and Raul Garcia, chairman of the Seminary Board, read the Scripture. John Howard Toder, president of Goshen Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Ind., and visiting professor in several theological schools and seminaries in Montevideo presented the graduation address, "Power and Wisdom."

Seminary president Ernst Harder led in commissioning of the graduates and conferring of degrees. Prayers of dedication were offered by Prof. Ernesto Suarez and student David Friesen. Harvey Graber, missionary in Riberao Preto, Sao Paulo, Brazil, led the benediction.

Twelve to Be Baptized in Gia Dinh Church

Twelve people, including a husband and wife and a number of young people, have been studying in preparation for baptism in December at the Gia Dinh congregation in Vietnam.

The Gia Dinh church continues to grow under the leadership of Pastor Tran Xuan Quang who replaced Eastern Board missionary James Stauffer in March 1969. Pastor Quang also serves as assistant director of material aid for Vietnam Christian Service.

Donald Sensenig, an Eastern Board missionary in Vietnam, reports, "Pastor Quang has been less than healthy for several weeks recently. He has been in and out of bed. He gets so many visitors when he stays home, he almost gets more rest by going to work! The congregation appreciates having the Quangs live close by the church and relate closely to the church and school programs."

Titus Peachey, Maynard Shirk, and Paul and Esther Bucher—all Eastern Board overseas mission associates—have completed two months of full-time language study with a good foundation in Vietnamese. They will continue spending part time in further study. All of them have already made friends with students through English classes; they will be teaching even more now.

The four mission associates are considering other possible projects: opening a student hostel, teaching in the university, or assisting Vietnam Christian Service in maintenance.

Luke and Dorothy Beidler this month became the first Eastern Board missionaries in Vietnam to move outside the Saigon-Gia Dinh area; they found a house in Can Tho, a city 100 miles southwest of Saigon on the Mekong River.

Donald Sensenig, Eastern Board missionary in Saigon, wrote, "A new currency exchange rate has provided more 'green power.' Under the new exchange rate, one U.S. dollar is exchanged for 275 Vietnamese piasters instead of the 118 piasters as under the old rate. "While this benefits us as Americans, it only burdens further our struggling Vietnamese friends and the inflation-plagued Vietnamese market. Inflation continues unchecked."

MCC Saskatchewan Annual Meeting Held

Delegates representing the 106 Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches of Saskatchewan gathered in Saskatoon on Nov. 11 on what has almost become the traditional date for MCC Saskatchewan’s annual meeting. The meeting was ably conducted by chairman James Mullet, Guernsey, who was later reelected for a new three-year term of office. Ironically, the sessions began with the singing of the hymn, “Soldiers of Christ, Arise,” the delegates being seated all the while. However, items of concern sparked lively discussion in the afternoon sessions. Delegate sessions were held in the Central MB Church, with the Women’s Auxiliary holding its meeting in the Mayfair Mennonite Church in the morning, and then joining the regular deliberations for the afternoon proceedings. New chairman for the Women’s Auxiliary is Mrs. Nick Willems, Saskatoon.

Morning sessions were taken up with constitutional amendments, which now provide for up to and including a three-year term of office for the chairman and executive members.

Devotional messages morning and afternoon served to keep in focus the work which is done “in the name of Christ.” John D. Friese challenged the assembly to remember that Christ works through them. Paul Longacre, from the Akron office, brought the international perspective of MCC into both the afternoon and evening meetings.

The most heat generated during the day came in the discussion regarding the Peace, Relief and Service Section, during the afternoon presentation of section reports and concerns. Questions of the political involvement of MCC, helping draft dodgers who tended toward radicalness, and cooperation with groups whose theological base varies from that of the Mennonites were among the queries. Chairman Mullet reminded the delegates that the principle of MCC is to help all people in need, irrespective of religion, race, or color. He also added a note about our own Mennonite brethren who dodged the draft some fifty years ago and received assistance at that time.

Another issue which evoked response was the one raised by Jake Letkeman, chairman of the Welfare and Social Concerns Section. He indicated that in the program to place Indian children in Mennonite homes for a period during the summer months, the greatest barrier came not with the Indians, but with the Mennonites who were afraid to risk themselves in opening their homes to strangers. Fear was the greatest barrier we need to conquer, said Dr. Letkeman. Numerous individuals testified to the effectiveness of the program and how favorably they had been impressed with the Indian children. Besides the summer placement program, new avenues of aid to the Indian people are being explored.

A suggestion for organizational shakeup would allow for greater communication among the individual Boards of MCC Saskatchewan, particularly in regard to the three homes administered by the Mental Health Section and between the Boards and the Executive Committee. The Executive Committee will investigate possibilities in this area.

Secretary-Treasurer Elmer W. Neufeld reported that part of the success in meeting the 1969/70 budget could be attributed to the June relief sale, a first-time effort which netted around $20,000. Criticisms and suggestions for improving the sale were made. The 1971 version is to be held in Saskatoon on June 19. MCC Saskatchewan’s budget for 1970/71 was set at $70,500.

The evening rally zeroed in on the 50th anniversary of MCC and emphasized past, present, and future aspects of the worldwide ministry. Isaac Block, who earlier in the day had received tribute for his eighteen years of service to MCC Saskatchewan and the Mennonite Relief and Immigration Committee, reflected on what MCC had meant in the past, particularly emphasizing the assistance given to refugees from Russia. The present possibilities for MCC involvement, especially in Asia, were outlined by Paul Longacre. In speaking to the future of MCC, John Friese continued his morning theme based on early chapters in the Book of Revelation and called for renewed dedication to Christ so that service rendered “in the name of Christ” might ring true. The Rosthern Junior College Chorale sang several selections.

The Executive Committee officers of MCC (Sask.) are: Chairman — James Mullet, Guernsey; Vice-Chairman — John J. Neufeld, Herbert; Secretary — Peter R. Derksen, Swift Current; Treasurer — Elmer W. Neufeld, Saskatoon. Office at 126 22 Street West, Saskatoon, Sask.

New VS Venture for Argentine Church

Three youths, Ricardo Perugoria, Bonnie Perelli, and Susana Rodriguez, from the Argentine Mennonite Church, on Dec. 1 began their three-month term of summer Voluntary Service in El Vi, Bolivia. They are working in the Mennonite Central Committee program in Bolivia, assisting in carpentry and literacy work and Bible teaching.

Agustin Darino, ordained minister serving at the Ramos Mejia congregation, and Delbert Erb, Argentine coordinator for planning the summer VS assignments, concluded the work arrangements with Dale Linsenmeyer, director of the MCC program in Bolivia. Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., is sharing with the Argentine Mennonite Conference in covering the cost of the summer VS program.

Ricardo has studied three years in the Christian and Missionary Alliance Bible Institute in Buenos Aires, and has served on the staff of El Discipulo Cristiano, the Mennonite magazine in Spanish. Bonnie has studied one year at the Alliance Institute and worked two years in the office of a clinic in Ramos Mejia. Susana served in VS in Paraguay from 1967-68, teaching school at Kilometer 81. For the past two years she studied at Seminario Evangelico Menonita de Teologia in Montevideo, Uruguay.

Family Life TV Spots Translated into Spanish

Two Family Life TV Spots from the English series produced by Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., were selected for translation and release in Spanish-speaking Latin America. Both spots are from the 1969 Family Life Series. Spot No. 1 is entitled “It’s a Great Day to Be Alive,” and Spot No. 2 is entitled “Love and Understanding in Marriage.”

!Aaron M. King and Paul Godshall, who were responsible for the Spanish versions, view the spots before sending them to the stations.
Paul Godshall, promotional director for International Cultural Services, handled the promotion and distribution of the spots. On Sept. 19, 1970, all 142 TV stations in Latin America were sent information about the spots as a public service release. In Latin America there are no regulations which require stations to provide free public service time as required of stations in North America. A second letter of promotion and description of the spots was sent on Oct. 3, 1970, to the stations in an effort to have them released as a public service to their communities. On Oct. 17, 1970, Spot No. 1 was sent to 138 stations. As of Nov. 10, 1970, 18 stations have requested Spot No. 2.

Godshall received a letter from the president's office of TELESTEMA MEXICANO, S.A., a network of powerful TV stations in Mexico expressing a sincere and deep interest in the spots.

Godshall expressed his enthusiasm for this new venture in a recent letter, "I'm happy to know there are lots of people 'holding their breath' to see what will come of this initial TV thrust. I trust they are making it a matter of prayer, as well as vigilance, as we also are. I am optimistic. The letters are coming in and every one is encouraging."

VS-ers Witness Through Newspaper Report

"The reporter that came really made us all do a lot of thinking about our stand as conscientious objectors here in Anderson," reported Joe Metzler after he and five other Mennonite Voluntary Service workers were interviewed recently by a reporter from the Anderson (S.C.) Daily Mail.

Joe said, "We feel it was a great opportunity to tell people just what we are here for. Since the article appeared in the paper, many people have come to us asking questions."

The article reported on the VS-ers' jobs and hobbies, and summarized Mennonite history and faith. The article stated, "As Mennonites, they believe in a personal relationship with God. The Mennonite faith is one of nonresistance and day-to-day Christianity. Perhaps their religious philosophy could be summed up in the commandment Jesus gave: 'Love thy neighbor.' "

"Indeed, these young people are full of love for their fellowmen. When someone needs aid, they are ready to help."

The six VS-ers work at the Anderson Hospital. They are Joe Metzler, Nathan Eby, Earle Yoder, Ed Martin, Jo Ann Hostetter, and Andrea Gillin. They serve under the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, Salunga, Pa.

Martin Counsels Way to Life Listeners

"I am a regular listener to the Way to Life program which comes on the air every Wednesday morning over Radio Belize. Your program has brought many blessings to me. I became a Christian and am indeed happy in my new life. Please continue spreading the good news by means of your correspondence course."

This letter from a young lady is one of many received by missionary Paul Z. Martin in Belize, British Honduras, every year. Inquiries about the gospel and Home Bible Studies courses are directed to Martin through the Way to Life, an English-language program broadcast on Radio Belize by Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., Harrisonburg, Va.

Not all of the correspondents offer testimonies of faith; some ask questions and these Martin attempts to answer. He corrects the lessons of the 400 persons enrolled in the Bible study courses offered on the Way to Life radio program. Martin writes letters and follows up many inquiries with personal visits.

Martin reports, "I have found a family 46 miles out of Belize in the jungles. The mother and two daughters are taking the Bible course. The father told me that they study the courses together around the table and that the way they live has changed and they are much happier. The mother added, 'The priest has baptized us as babies but we want the believer's baptism. When will you baptize us? How many lessons must we take to become a member of the Way to Life church?'"

Paul Martin serves under the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, Salunga, Pa.

TV Spots to Treat Peace Theme

The board of directors of Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., has approved the theme of "Reconciliation" for the next series of TV spots. "The Art of Peacemaking" and "The Art of Living Simply" were chosen for development. It was projected that these spots would be produced in the summer of 1971 and released in January 1972.

Thanks to a unique offer from TRAFCO, the TV and Film Commission of the United Methodist Church in Nashville, Tenn., immediate action is being taken to produce the "Peace Spots." The United Methodist Church gave permission to TRAFCO to offer its labor and facilities free of charge to several denominations during November and December.

TRAFCO, however, sees an immediate need for productions dealing with peace-making and, realizing Mennonites' convictions on peace, is donating an equivalent of $7,900 to the production of the "Peace Spots." The additional $20,000 needed to complete the project is to be met by a combined effort of Mennonites in the U.S. and Canada. A grant to the MCC Peace Section has already enabled them to underwrite part of the funding. On Nov. 12 and 13 representatives of the three sponsoring groups — Mennonite Central Committee, General Conference Mennonite Church, and Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. — met in Chicago to thoroughly evaluate and edit submitted scripts. Production will be completed in December and general release will follow in April 1971 across the U.S. and Canada. The spots speaking to the theme of “The Art of Living Simply” are already being written, will be produced next summer, and are to be released in January 1972. TV spot production is an integral part of the mass communications ministry of Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., Harrisonburg, Va.

Material Aid Center Dedicated in Berlin, Ohio

In spite of the inclement weather some 65 persons were present on Nov. 14 for the dedication of the Material Aid Center in Berlin, Ohio. The Center is located on the west side of Berlin along U.S. 62 and S.R. 39. The Center, built by the Holmes-Tuscarawas Relief Committee, was actually finished in time for the beef-canning project last year and plans have been made for four or five days of relief canning again in February 1971. The thirty by sixty foot building is made of glazed tile inside and brick outside. It is built on land that was donated at a cost of $5,620, but this is only part of the actual cost. Some of the material and almost all of the labor was donated. About a hundred men helped in the building. Apart from meat canning, it will be used for soap-making and the usual collecting and processing of clothing, blankets, and other goods for MCC relief. Pastor Paul Hummel led in the service of dedication. Erwin Gingrich, representing the Amish, led in a German prayer. Peter J. Dyck brought the dedicatory message.

Following the dedicatory service the ladies served coffee, cakes, and cookies.

Mother of Brazil missionary Glenn E. Musselman, died following two strokes and other complications, on Saturday evening, Nov. 21. Funeral services were held at Gettysburg, Pa., on Wed., Nov. 25. The address for Glenr. C. P. 1214 (Vila Arens) Jundiai, Est. de S.P., Brazil.

The Ghana visa for Stanley Freyenberg of Wayland, Iowa, was received on Fri., Nov. 20. Stan left by air on Thurs., Nov. 26. His field address: P.O. Box 40, Bawku, U.R., Ghana.

Mrs. Dale Schumm, Latehar, Bihar, India, Nov. 13: “Yesterday was the day for the annual women’s meeting held at Chand- wa with about 120 women present. For the first time it was entirely planned and completely run by the Indian women themselves. . . . Monday evening Dale leaves for Mussoorie to escort the 10 Bihar children home for the Christmas and winter vacation.”

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Buckwalter, Chaco, Argentina, Nov. 17: “Since February we have finished translating into Toba 50 more manuscript pages of Old Testament selections, the letter of James, most of First Corinthians, and enough special passages to make up a manual which church leaders can use at communion, baptism, and similar occasions.” The Buckwalters will be on furlough taking up residence after New Year’s at 1015 South 15th St., Goshen, Ind. 46526.

Mr. and Mrs. Lloy Kniss, missionaries in India from 1926-42, have moved from Maryland to Virginia. Their new address: 195 Crescent Drive, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801.

Mrs. Agustin Darino of Ramos Mejia, Argentina, passed away on Oct. 18 at the age of 57. She had been suffering from cancer. Mr. Darino is an ordained minister and serving at the Ramos Mejia congregation. Several years ago he was the Arg- enite Mennonite Church fraternal visitor to North America for our annual churchwide meetings. Those acquainted with Brother Darino may wish to write him at Espora 655, Ramos Mejia, B.A., Argentina.

Mr. and Mrs. B. Charles Hostetter, Lagos, Nigeria, Nov. 1: “There are about 50 young people in Nigeria under the MCC programs of Teachers Abroad and Pax—that is counting men and wives and single people. They are planning a week’s retreat over Christmas. I have been asked to come and conduct an hour and a half Bible study each day and communion on Sunday evening.”

Every congregation has its committee of trustees to care for the building. But do they all have an evangelism or missions committee to help the congregation determine and fulfill its mission? Is this an indication of our priorities?

A congregation can dig into debt to construct or remodel a building. But is there record of a Mennonite congregation borrowing money or mortgaging its building for a mission cause? Is this an indication of our priorities?

We have an average cost of about $500,000 in our building program over the last 23 years. This means that construction alone costs that congregation $400,000. This is $20 for each hour the building is used! Is this good stewardship? Would we run a business on that kind of economics?

If we are going to pay attention to this question will cause congregations to consider creatively how to be good stewards of the facilities they have. Some congregations are using their facilities to fulfill their mission. May I suggest that a feature in the Gospel Herald could report what they are doing. They could be an inspiration to the rest of us — Henry P. Yoder, Souderton, Pa.

In "The Master Week," Nov. 17 Gospel Herald, it seems to us that Don Kravill is bringing into focus a most timely message in a unique way. He is trying to show to us his feeling that God's presence is really real, and if the people will come together in the Lord's presence, things stem to come as we are ready to sell everything in order to have the treasure.

We would also commend Bro. Drescher for his concept of God's presence and prophetic editorials. We are sensing a surge of new life in the church and are happy to see it being reflected in the Gospel Herald. — Albert Zehr, Baden, Ont.

Many times I have told myself to write and express appreciation for the messages the Gospel Herald contains. I apologize for not having done this before. Time and again I am impressed with reading the articles of the Gospel Herald. The Gospel Herald is many things to many people as it is to me: among which is its continual message to the spiritual needs of the church joining in an effort to show the relevancy of the gospel today. — Ross Goldfuß, Argentina.

That was a good and timely editorial in the Oct. 27 Gospel Herald on tithing. We are not giving anything until we give more than the tenth. The tenth already belongs to the Lord. If tithing was taught as it should be as part of all the things, it would help solve many of the money problems of the mission board. It seems strange that so many Christians ignore this teaching. I agree fully with everything you wrote about tithing.

If we give the Lord His share, the tenth plus freewill offerings, it will help us to have peace of mind.

If we know these things, happy are we if we do them. In our Sunday school lesson for Nov. 17, "Get It Right," tithing was not mentioned. — Harry L. Kappman, Mio, Mich.

Today we would like to put in writing our feeling of appreciation for the valuable contribution you are making in the field of Christian literature. We thank God for your dedication in this area.

May God continue to bless your ministry to the upbuilding of the saints in Christ Jesus. — Mr. & Mrs. Mervin A. Yoder, Bristol, Ind.

Development in Light of the Christmas Event

By David W. Shenk

It was Christmas Eve at a German road building camp which scarred the Somali bush about 100 kilometers from any of those patches of civilization commonly known as towns. I was there to conduct a midnight worship service for the engineers and their families.

As I walked with the camp director toward the grass thatched chapel which was studded with natural-looking Christmas tree thorn scrub, I asked my host why he had invited me.

The tall Aryan paused on the sand track a moment contemplating. In the silence the emptiness of the savanna seemed to squeeze us. The gentle throbbing of the camp generator was blanketed and muffled by the stillness. An umbrella tree twisted aimlessly in the equatorial breeze. A clinking camel bell tugged at the silence, and a herder’s call too. The Southern Cross dipped precariously toward the horizon informing the world that midnight was just past. This was Christmas Eve Somali-style, and indeed the atmosphere could not have been much unlike Bethlehem’s hillsides of two millennia ago.

Carefully the tall German pieced his thoughts together.

“‘My work is development. The new highway you traveled on tonight is the best road ever built in the Horn of Africa. We’re blazing this extension of technology into the nowhere beyond hoping that it will stimulate progressive agricultural settlements throughout the hinterland. I have been working at this sort of thing for twenty years, in many different countries, and I have come to believe that Christmas has a lot to do with this kind of development.’”

“Do you mean that you believe that Christmas has something to do with turning a muddy track into hard-top, and bushland into farmland?”

“Yes,” the German continued. “Only several hundred years ago the Aryan races were certainly not development-prone. But now we are different. What has revolutionized us? I believe the springboard of our own development, and that anywhere, is Jesus Christ. That’s why we want to have a Christian Christmas. Come now, let us celebrate the event with worship.”

While sipping coffee later that night, we resumed our conversation. What, if anything, does Jesus Christ have to do with economic progress and technology—building roads, X rays, rockets, miracle rice? Perhaps it’s because the per capita income of vast segments of the world’s poverty population is actually declining that a lot of keen thinkers are asking the same questions we asked ourselves that Christmas Eve in an engineering camp tucked away in the obscurity of the Somali bush.

At the risk of oversimplification, I’ll summarize some of our coffee-cup generalizations.

First, Jesus Christ made technology possible by refuting the idea of irrationality in the universe and nature and by demonstrating His power over the spirit world.

You just can’t have technology when you are scared of evil spirits. You can’t think rationally and scientifically if you believe God or the gods are crazy. Through Jesus Christ, God, and consequently His creation also, is seen in rational perspective, and the spirit world loses its blinding terror.

In fact, a convinced animist can never be a scientist, even though he is a PhD from Cornell. Animism and the scientific outlook are irreconcilable. It is particularly noteworthy that the brief intrusion of Greek dialectic into the ancient world was quickly smothered precisely because the basic premise of the Greek world view was fundamentally animistic, or perhaps better said, ontological. Indeed it was only in the cauldron of medieval Christianity that the scientific perspective finally found a home.

But there is more to technology than science. Science is a way of viewing nature; technology is a way of using nature. Technology is science committed to using nature for whatever purposes man may devise. Science theorized about the atom; technology blasted Hiroshima to bits. Science discovered mutations; technology developed miracle rice.

The contemporary conviction that nature should be brought under the control of man and used as man wants to use it is fundamentally biblical. In fact it begins with Genesis 1 and the creation of man: man who was clearly given a good world; a world to be loved and used by man. It is astonishing that this concept of man-nature relationship is not found anywhere else in ancient mythologies, and even today there are a lot of highly sophisticated people who, speaking from non-Christian traditions, decry any attempt to make nature subservient to the will of man. But the biblical message is clear: God created a good earth and gave it to man to use. And that conviction is the second pillar upon which technology must stand; the belief in a rational world is the first.

David W. Shenk is a Mennonite missionary in Mogadisco, Somalia.

Gospel Herald, December 22, 1970

Second, Jesus humanized relationships. He is the conscience of the world, and as such His influence is felt far beyond the confines of the church, and even the Christianized world for that matter.

Christian conscience tempers the uses man puts to technology; indeed it must be so, for technology without conscience is demonic indeed. Jesus Christ constantly calls man to humanize his technological achievements, and when man obeys, one dare say: that is progress.

Equally important is the community which Jesus Christ introduced. Indeed it may be said that authentic community is found only in Christ. Now if development is community, and that's what a good many anthropologists are saying, then Christians have a special mission simply helping communities be community. Without the tempering effect of community, economic progress tends to be dissipated in the selfishness of the privileged few. But Christian faith introduces love into relationships, and so exploitive capitalism is squelched. Certainly this is one of the reasons that in the developing world, Christian communities are usually the pace setters in economic development.

Third, Jesus Christ introduced hope into the world, and hope is the seedbed of progress. Jesus showed that history has purpose because God is involved in life, and because there is an eternal dimension to living.

That was a tremendous psychological breakthrough. The pagan world could imagine history as being nothing but empty purposelessness: witness the jeers Paul earned at Athens when he spoke of a resurrection.

When purposelessness is replaced by hope; when the goal of life becomes life everlasting instead of nothingness, then man is truly freed to enjoy life now: he is free to live vigorously, joyfully, purposefully. This spiritual revolution has a tremendous impact on development as such. If a man is free to live in the hope of the eschatology, he is in that same stroke of hope freed to really live now. He'll think straight instead of crooked; long instead of short. He'll plant a mango tree or two for his grandchildren to enjoy. He'll get some big six-inch sheeting to replace the thatched roof. He does this because he has found purpose.

Perhaps by now you think this coffee-cup chitchat about road building is whimsy. But it's not. If you aren't sure that Jesus Christ is the essential ingredient in authentic development, just try to thread a highway of progress through virgin land where He has never been known, and see where you come out.

Of course Jesus Himself said: "I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly."

The Light of Christmas
By Abram H. Charles

Christmas is a time of many beautiful lights. Would to God these lights would typify the light of the Lord Jesus shining forth from the hearts of men. But we know in many cases this is not true, for they portray Santa Claus more than they do the Christ of Christmas. How true are the words of 1 Jn. 5:19, "the whole world lieth in wickedness" and also Rom. 3, "there is none righteous, no, not one . . . there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way . . . for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Is it possible that with all the lights of Christmas, people are in darkness? Yes, how great is that darkness?

However, amidst this great darkness there is light. "The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up" (Mt. 4:16). God knew the need in the sin-darkened hearts of men, therefore, He sent His only Son as a sacrifice for the sin of the whole world. "For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord" (Lk. 2:11). "[He is] the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (Jn. 1:9).

The marvelous light of Christ can fill your life with blessings if you open your heart to Him, or it can become void by your rejection. It is much the same today as it was when John the Baptist was standing on the bank of the Jordan River. He said, "There standeth one among you, whom ye know not." Today, as then, Christ stands waiting to be known of men. We need to cry out, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

The angel Gabriel had the blessed privilege of proclaiming the good news of the coming Savior. Did you ever stop to think that you have the same privilege? What greater joy could come to you than to see another receive the light of Christ? The promise is, "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." Is the true light of Christmas burning in your heart, or are the dazzling lights of the world blinding your eyes? Make this Christmas season a joyous one by letting the true Light shine, undimmed by worldly hindrances.
Impractical Giving

Surely anything I could possibly say about Christmas has been said before. So let me just make a few comments on how I feel as Christmas 1970 comes.

I feel we are often much too practical at Christmas. It is a time to be hopelessly impractical. Once I gave my wife a vacuum cleaner for Christmas which was a rather silly thing to do. It was so horribly practical. I could have spent the $25 on something foolish like the biggest, most fragrant bunch of red roses she ever saw. That would have said ten times more about how I felt, and it would have created a beautiful memory besides. The fact that I could hardly have afforded that many roses would simply have made the "I love you" message that much more powerful.

One of the best gifts Jesus got was just as impractical. Remember the alabaster box of ointment? Half a year's wages for a domestic! Yet when one of Jesus' disciples pointed out how impractical it was, how stupid, and how much better it would have been to give an equivalent amount to the poor, Jesus corrected him. Because of the impracticality of the gift it said so much more. And it still encourages others to give in the same way. What if the woman would have given Jesus a vacuum cleaner?

I'd love to see all sorts of impractical gifts given this Christmas, especially between husbands and wives. Just think how we could surprise and please each other. Just think of the joy and the creativity we would generate by trying to be as deliberately impractical as possible, and nobody getting the gift would dare to use the trite old phrase, "Just what I need," because it would have nothing to do with need. It would simply say something.

Now there is another angle. Maybe our giving should be a bit reckless. Can you imagine anything more risky than for God to send His only begotten Son into the world as a baby? Think of all the things that might have happened to Him! Think of the things that just about did happen. What a terribly dangerous way to give the most valuable Gift ever given. But doesn't it tell us a whole lot about God? The way He gave the Gift, the risks He took, tell us as much as the Gift itself.

How could we be more risky in our giving? For one thing, we might give to those who certainly could not give an equivalent gift in return. We might also be careful that no strings are attached to a gift, no obligations hooked to them, nothing expected in return for the gift. In fact, perhaps we could give to some who will not even return a hint of appreciation.

I wonder whether God got as much appreciation for the Gift He gave as He should have? This would be a good

By Still Waters

"Are you so foolish? Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh" (Gal. 3:3)?

How foolish to forget it. Yet we do so easily. We know that we cannot begin the Christian life without the Spirit of God, using God's Word, convicting us of our lostness and regenerating our lives. That is, the Holy Spirit of God gives us new life. Apart from Him we cannot become Christians or be called Christians. His work is to make us new creatures in Christ.

But the Holy Spirit's work is also to produce the life of Christ in us. And we can no more live the life of Christ without the Holy Spirit's power than we can become new creatures without His power. The Galatians forgot this fact. And we also often forget. So we set out to live the Christ life in our own strength. We seek to make ourselves mature in the strength of the flesh. No wonder we fail. No wonder little more is produced in our lives than the fruit of the flesh rather than the fruit of the Spirit.

So the Holy Spirit who has brought us to faith also indwells us in our battle against evil. The Spirit purifies us from sin by applying the Word of God to our lives. The Holy Spirit reveals the righteousness of Christ, who forgives our sin. The difference between the convicting of the Holy Spirit and the condemnation of the devil is that when the Holy Spirit reveals our sin and unworthiness He always shows us Christ's cleansing blood and Christ's accomplishment on our behalf.

Let us not be so foolish as to think that we can live the Christian life by ourselves. Let us walk in the Spirit step by step even as we began in the Spirit.

O God,
When we do what we want to — free us.
When we don't do what we can — forgive us.
When we can't do anything — save us.
When we seek to do Your will — help us.

Origin of the Specious

A couple of years ago we added something new to our Christmas decorations — a traditional holiday wreath slightly modified by the inclusion of an inverted Y to form the internationally recognized symbol of peace. It seemed to us that the idea of peace went naturally and well with Christmas.

Then we began to be told how wrong we were. We were told that the peace symbol is nothing less than satanic in origin, and has been used by the practitioners of black magic; that it represents an inverted cross, and is a symbol of the Antichrist. What’s more, and maybe worse, it also claims communist origins, and as such is a symbol of the communist philosophy and its goals.

In short, we were told that our use of the peace symbol — especially at Christmas — was both unchristian and un-American. Not because peace itself is inconsistent with either Christianity or Americanism, but simply because of how its symbol had originated.

We aren’t really convinced that these assertions regarding the genesis of that symbol are entirely accurate, but the notion that a thing’s origins are absolutely determinative of its validity and application was intriguing. A quick check of the Encyclopaedia Britannica proved enlightening.

Take December 25, for example. Originally (AD 274) that was the date set by the emperor Aurelian as the birthday of the “unconquered sun.” It took something like 50 years before the church at Rome began to celebrate the birthday of Christ on the same date. If Christmas is to be understood only in terms of its origin, it is nothing more than a long outdated pagan rite.

Or consider the manner of gift-giving, which is sometimes thought to symbolize the gift of God’s Son. Actually, the practice of exchanging presents can be traced to the Roman festival of Saturnalia, held in honor of the god Saturn. It was only later that gifts were adapted to, and adopted by, the Christian celebration of Christmas.

But interesting though the question of its origin may be, what is most important about Christmas is not how or when or where it came into existence. It is important for what it says. Christmas says that Christ was born, and that the message of love He brought is still worth hearing. What Christmas says is much too important to relinquish, even if our celebration of it didn’t get started in the right fashion.

That’s also true of the peace symbol. It reminds us that goodwill toward others is better than hatred, that peace on earth remains worth working for. And that’s a message too important to abandon, even if it is true (as we’ve been told) that the communists actually want peace, too.

Merry Christmas. Peace. They go well together. Whatever their origins.

Can That Be Right?

A pastor shared the happy news that his congregation averaged $50.00 per member for the General Mission Board last year. Now if you know that the asking was $33.00 per member and that many do not even make this you can see why he rejoiced.

But suddenly it dawned upon this pastor and his people that even with such a good record the total giving of the congregation to missions for the entire year equaled only one year’s depreciation of several automobiles in the parking lot on Sunday morning. Can that be right?

A certain man prided himself in his contribution to the church. He gave far above average. He was startled, however, by the fact that his family’s one-week vacation cost him more than his total yearly giving to the church. The weekly depreciation on his car was more than his weekly offering. His boat motor cost more than his yearly offering. Can that be right?

A certain congregation was planning to build a new church building. The interest money alone on the money for the proposed building would support four or more full-time persons per year. Perhaps wisdom would declare putting persons on the church payroll to work in the community rather than to pay interest money for a nice building. After all people do not come to church because of a beautiful building but because of people.

Maybe there are numerous other solutions to the problem of church building space. What about more than one worship service? After all it is only on Sunday morning when churches are threatened with any space problem. Other meetings are fairly full of empty benches. Even additional weekday evening worship services might be preferable to building if the Sunday service has too large attendance.

So also the story and mood of our times might well be saying we’ve put enough into brick and mortar. Without doubt church property will soon be taxed. And, with the clamor against the wealth of the church, can the church go on demonstrating its wealth and unconcern for the poor by pouring more and more into larger and expensive buildings to be used once a week?

Have we put buildings above people in our priorities? Can that be right? — D.
"I Hold
Nothing Against You"

By Henry P. Yoder

"I held a position of prestige and privilege in the Department of Public Health in pre-Castro Cuba. I had a chauffeur-driven car provided by the government and a high salary with all that goes with it. I was a highly respected member of the Cuban Medical Association. Materially I was very secure."

A Broken Man

The person he was describing was far different from the Dr. Martinez I was talking with in the very simple but functional Christian clinic set up to minister to the disadvantaged of the city. As he talked of bitterness and hostility, then of forgiveness and reconciliation I decided that his story needed to be shared. It was evident that his ability to forgive and to experience reconciliation came from what he had received from God.

When Castro's government came into power Dr. Martinez was stripped of his position and his wealth. Because of his ties with former governments he was unsafe in his country. So he escaped with his family to the United States.

Because of his personal losses he, with many other refugees, wanted revenge and began plotting Castro's overthrow. He joined an anti-Castro organization and participated in the ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion. He was one of the few invaders fortunate enough to escape capture and after many difficulties was able to rejoin his family in this country.

He returned to his family a broken man. He saw nothing in the future. The aspirations for his country were frustrated by the turn of political events. He did not know English and so was unable to take the rigorous examination that would enable him to qualify as a physician in this country.

Should he want to study and qualify as a physician there was a barrier in his way, placed there by one who at one time was a friend but more recently turned political enemy! In a first blush of support for the new regime the Cuban Medical Association resolved to exclude all members who fled to the United States. Dr. Martinez knew personally the man who made the motion at their convention. He knew that the action was taken in part because of a political grudge against him. This meant that he had no documentation to identify him as a physician.

A Reconciled Man

Late one afternoon Dr. Martinez sat on a park bench, a discouraged, broken man, weary of life. His mind was beclouded by anxieties and fears. His spirit was broken and frustrated. His soul was shriveled by hatred and hostilities. He had no place to turn. The whole world seemed to be against him. He saw no hope for the future.

A Christian physician happened to pass by. He noticed the dejected, discouraged, desperate figure of a man slouched on the park bench. He sat beside him. They began to talk as they were able through the language barrier.

The Christian was surprised and challenged to learn that this man was also a physician. He recognized his outstanding brilliance and prayed for guidance to help him.

In one of the many visits that followed the Christian physician led Dr. Martinez to faith in Christ. He found forgiveness and reconciliation to God. The hostilities were gone. In their place he found peace and joy unknown before.

Dr. Martinez also found reconciliation with himself. The haunting memories of the past, the brokenness, the doubts, and the fears that plagued and tormented him were gone. He had accepted the forgiveness God offered him in Christ and lived in it. He was able to accept himself and assess his abilities.

The road ahead was not easy. But he found courage to study English. He enrolled in a vigorous study program and prepared for the examination for foreign physicians. When I met Dr. Martinez he was working in a clinic operated by the church of which he became a very active member.

A Reconciling Man

In this clinic he had many opportunities to help persons to healing of the body and of the soul. He met many discouraging experiences but I always found him cheerful with a ready testimony. He was always available when anyone needed help. He initiated new programs in the clinic which won for it a good reputation in the city.

Henry P. Yoder, former Cuban missionary, is with the Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Souderton, Pa.

With the passing of years many of the first supporters of Castro became disenchanted and also fled that island. Among them was the man who had presented the motion to have Dr. Martinez's name struck from the Cuban Medical Association. By a turn of events he came to live in the same city as Dr. Martinez.

This man's daughter became sick and on the recommendation of a neighbor he took her to the clinic on Washington Avenue.

So it happened that the two men met face-to-face! Men who at one time had been friends but because of political differences became enemies to the point where taking each other's lives would have been easy.

"I hold nothing against you," said Dr. Martinez after he recovered from the first shock of seeing who was there. "I have already forgiven you all the wrong you caused me. All that is past." He admitted the resentment he felt at one time and the hatred he knew in the past. But he went on to explain how he was able to forgive because of the forgiveness he had experienced from God.

The two men embraced in restored friendship.

Hostilities Prevent Reconciliation

Why was Dr. Martinez able to forgive the man who had done most to harm him? How is it possible for any person to forgive another a wrong?

One theologian suggests that a reconciler is characterized by his ability to absorb hostilities and tensions. Another states that the one who forgives—thereby assumes and carries the burden of the wrong committed.

It naturally follows, then, that the person filled with hostilities, hates, anger, and who is not at peace with himself cannot be a reconciler. He cannot absorb hostilities, tensions, anger, hatreds, or carry the wrongs of another. That person must first of all find forgiveness and wholeness in his own heart.

Hostility, anger, hatred, and broken relationships are the result of sin and they belong to the old nature. Paul affirms this when writing that anger, passion, and hateful feelings belong to the old nature that the Christian has put away." (Colossians 3:8.) In another description of the sinful nature, he writes that "people become enemies, they fight, become jealous, angry, and ambitious. They separate into parties and groups." (Gal. 5:20).

Therefore when such a person meets hostilities and hateful feelings from another person or group he responds in kind. The result is increased hostility, further alienation, greater brokenness not only of relationships with others but also of one's own self. Therefore a man like Dr. Martinez in his bitterness and hatred could only continue hating those who had wronged him. Fights and quarrels, insists James, "come from . . . passions, which are constantly fighting within." (Jas. 4:1).

Christ Removes Hostilities

Paul writes that "anger, passion, hateful feelings" belong to the old self and its habits that the Christian has put off. (Colossians 3:8-10.) In Ephesians he tells the believers: "Get rid of all bitterness, passion, and anger. No more shouting or insults! No more hateful feelings of any sort" (Eph. 4:31)! The Christian, he adds, has put off all these things. He is a new creation: the old has passed, the new has come. In place of hostilities and hatreds the people of God put on compassion, kindness, humility, gentleness, and patience. They are helpful to one another and forgive one another, whenever any has a complaint against someone else. They forgive each other in the same way that the Lord has forgiven them. (Colossians 3:12, 13.)

When a person, as Dr. Martinez, responds to God's love in Christ he is not only forgiven but Christ takes up residence in the believer's heart with all His compassion and love. Christ was able to absorb the hostilities and hatreds and anger completely. The Gospels show how He absorbed the hostilities and tensions:

— of the angry synagogue congregation in His hometown;
— of the cunning and conning of the Pharisees, Sadducees, Herodians, priests, and the religious establishment; — of the selfish, miracle-curious crowds that openly rejected Him;
— of His own inner circle of twelve, torn by jealousies, angry and arguing about which should be the greatest;
— of those who participated in His crucifixion, praying for their forgiveness.

Christ's love that absorbs all hostilities, hatreds, and tensions becomes the Christian's because He promised: "Peace I leave with you; my own peace I give you." (Jn. 14:27).

It is natural, then, for a Christian, like Dr. Martinez, to be a reconciler. When he meets hostility he cannot react in hostility. To do so would be to deny his trust in God. He would be reassuming his past hostilities that Christ has removed. Instead of hostility there is love: agape love, Christ's own tension-absorbing love.

It is natural for the Christian to reach out to any who come in hostility and anger and say: "I hold nothing against you."

Key 73-A Coordinated Evangelistic Thrust

By Howard J. Zehr

Might we be about to experience the most significant and far-reaching Christian movement of our generation? Could it be that the Holy Spirit is calling all Christians to focus more sharply upon their mission in the world? Might the eternal God be giving concrete evidence of His compassion and concern for every creature as articulated by the Apostle Peter when he said, "The Lord is not slow about his promise as some count slowness, but is forbearing toward you, not wishing that any should perish, but that all should reach repentance." (2 Pet. 3:9).

For some reason there seems to be a ground swell of concern and earnestness about the missionary-evangelistic task on the American continent. Church leaders are becoming genuinely concerned about the ineffectiveness of the church and the proliferation of uncoordinated efforts in carrying out her mission. This concern motivated some Christian leaders to meet together for prayer and discussion and a common search of ways and means to work more effectively in reaching the unchristian society of this continent. From a small beginning of a few concerned religious leaders, the movement known as Key 73 grew to involve many denominations and Christian groups. Key 73 is the designation given to a concerted evangelistic thrust that is projected to culminate in 1973. The discussion began with a small group in the Key Bridge Motel. It has now enlisted the participation of many of the mainline denominational groups as well as smaller religious bodies.

The plan is for a coordinated and concerted effort in evangelism by the pooling of resources to be made available as desired. Each participating body is completely free to cooperate to the extent which they desire and are able. A sixfold task force has been appointed to work in specific areas such as: 1) Congregational work, 2) Public proclamation, 3) Small-group work, 4) The mass media, 5) Literature and the arts, 6) Creative evangelism.

The Executive Committee of Mennonite General Conference believes this is a significant movement, and has the conviction that our church should cooperate in this coordinated effort in some way. The Executive Committee has therefore taken action to recommend our cooperation and encourage our congregations to participate.

An office for Key Bridge 73 has now been set up in St. Louis, Missouri. An executive coordinator is being sought. A Central Committee has been established which includes an executive committee and a representative of the respective participating denominations. The Executive Committee of Mennonite General Conference has asked its executive officer, Howard J. Zehr, to serve as our church's representative on the Central Committee for the present. Another meeting of this group was held in the Gateway Hotel, St. Louis, Missouri, December 7, 8.

The objectives agreed upon by the Planning Committee are:
1. To confront every person in North America more fully and more forcefully with the gospel of Jesus Christ.
2. To employ every means and method of communication of the gospel in order to create the conditions in which men may respond to God.
3. To apply the message and the meaning of Jesus Christ to the issues shaping man and his society in order that they may be resolved.
4. To develop new resources for effective evangelism for consideration, adoption, adaptation, or rejection by the participating churches.
5. To supplement the efforts of Christian congregations and organizations in becoming more effective redemptive centers and more aggressive witnesses to God's redeeming power in the world.

As can be noted from the objectives, a great amount of flexibility is built into the program. Each denomination, each congregation, each person is free to choose the degree of involvement and participation. Likewise, each is free to work at the evangelistic task in the context of his particular orientation and understanding of the evangelistic mandate given us by our Lord.
Giving to Causes Outside the Mennonite Church

It is a known fact that few of our churches are able to reach their potential in giving. It is also known that many members are giving substantial amounts to non-Mennonite causes. Such giving should be done discreetly. Here are some guidelines:

1. Is the organization willing to provide a financial statement? If not, it should be suspect.
2. Is the organization providing services not programmed in our church? For example, we have nothing similar to the program of the Bible Society or a linguistic program. We do, however, have excellent radio and TV ministries.
3. What percent of the donation is used for administration? Mennonite programs have maintained a 15 percent or less administrative cost while some others go up to 90 percent.
4. Is the project you are giving to centered around one man rather than an organization or church? If it is, it should be seriously questioned.
5. Is your giving being engendered by emotionalism alone or does the project or ministry have depth and content?
6. Are you willing to discuss the project you support with others in your congregation? Do so critically evaluating its use, theological content, etc.
7. Determine together as a congregation those areas you wish to support. Be willing, consistent, and diligent in supporting these individually.
8. In Anabaptist theology, a commitment to God predetermines a commitment to brotherhood. If so, we are obliged to support the denominational programs.
9. When giving helps fulfill a community need and strengthen community relations, be willing to assist financially.
10. Are you fulfilling your commitment to your local brotherhood, your conference, and General Conference before giving to other projects? — Prepared by the Western Ontario Mission Board.

Why They Died

By Ruth Burkholder

Her brother was the first to go, killed by her husband's jealous fear that he would be replaced.

Once ruler and still strong a threat, Grandfather Hyrcanus next had to die by the same insane command.

No love for wife as much as for his power, or else grown cold by fear, for she, too, Mariamne, must die.

The Maccabees must never have his throne. He would destroy them all. He would live and reign.

Bathed in blood, his throne was now secure? The Maccabean blood completely spilled? No — two remained, flesh of his flesh, sons of his and Mariamne, and they too died by their murdering father's will, to calm his insane fear.

But calm was shattered and terror in extreme seized King Herod's mind when was announced. "The King of Jews is born!"

All reason left and in his fright and rage the child-mind ordered infants killed that none might live to take his place.

The blood of one he did not kill was shed to heal the fear of such as he.

"My fellow-missionaries who come for furlough from South America and India, confirm my observation that our church preaching is everywhere less positive than formerly. The clear note of prophetic warning as to consequences of evil is not heard. More problematic than fixed phases of life are stressed. It is possible that entirely unconscious to ourselves a process of baneful undecidedness may mould our thought and practice. Unregenerate humanity does not care what we don't believe . . . but what we do believe and practice.

Three Goshen College professors, C. Franklin Bishop, Lester J. Zimmerman, and Jonathan N. Roth, have teamed up with the Hesston Foundation to help Haitians improve their agricultural conditions.

Bishop, who returned from a visit in late November, was enthusiastic about the progress and particularly impressed with a storage cellar that will make possible marketing of crops out of season.

The project began in 1968 when the Hesston Foundation accepted a plan for improvement submitted by Bishop. The plan called for the creation of a production and marketing cooperative that would be manned by Haitians.

The purpose of the first trip to Haiti, in spring, 1968, was to determine the chief factors in vegetable and small-fruit production and the potential for development of the Fermathe area, a plateau region 4,000 feet above sea level. Peasants own land which is well adapted to vegetable production. The area is only 15 miles from Port-au-Prince, a ready-made market for their crops.

At the end of the dry season that year, tomatoes, potatoes, head lettuce, cabbage, sweet corn, and green beans were growing. Bishop said, "The foliage color and general plant vigor indicated that the potential for outstanding production in both quality and quantity is present. There seemed to be no insurmountable obstacle to the achievement of maximum production of vegetables and certain small fruits, particularly strawberries."

On later trips, problems related to pest control and soil and water conservation were tackled, and strawberries were introduced.

To obtain data to determine the best times to plant crops, a Belfort hygrothermograph was set up to provide a continuous recording of relative humidity and temperature. When plotted beside the photoperiod record, the optimum planting dates for each crop can be determined precisely.

Crop Storage a Problem

Crop storage was a real problem. The prices of crops, in season, are low. Several weeks later, however, the prices are considerably higher. Unfortunately, proper storage facilities have not been available, so much of the crop has been wasted.

Bishop's recent trip, however, confirmed that large concrete underground storage silos are the answer. Forty bushels of potatoes stored in July were just beginning to sprout on Nov. 12, unheard of in the tropics. The silos are designed to exploit the prevailing winds with their low temperature and low humidity for best storage conditions. Quality control has been another important factor. Products with the Fermathe label must be of consistently high quality. However, efforts to assure good quality have been frustrated because rural Haitians adopt new practices slowly.

Full-Time Leader

Bishop is eager to see full-time direction in this area of Haiti. 'We've done about all we can do from a distance,' he said. "Now it is important to have someone down there all the time to take care of details."

Plans call for William Friesen, a Goshen College sophomore, to go to Haiti sometime in 1971 to demonstrate the value of practices developed by the Goshen College team and to lead Haitians in adopting them and setting up a cooperative marketing service.

According to Bishop, farming is not the only problem area. There is a crying need for reforestation in Haiti, otherwise erosion will continue to claim the precious topsoil. Further, the nutritional levels in people's diets also must be raised.

Interest in Haiti was sparked in 1967 when an investigative team of four persons representing the Council of Mennonite Colleges flew there to see what technical skills could be offered to help solve some of the agricultural problems. Goshen College was one of two schools to suggest projects. The philanthropic Hesston Foundation provided $9,000 for a three-year grant. The funds were used for travel, seeds, pesticides, and supplies to carry on research designed to get local crops through the growing season without insect and disease losses.

The next stage in this program will consist of training a few Haitians in the Fermathe community who have exhibited leadership potential. The project will not be considered a success until the new practices and techniques have been adopted by the farmers and the entire enterprise is under Haitian leadership.

Bishop is professor of biology, Roth is associate professor of biology, and Zimmerman is professor of mathematics and a specialist in soils science.

Treasurer Notes Financial Status

Contributions from Mennonite congregations for the work of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., are 4 percent less for the first seven months of the current fiscal year as compared to the same time period last year, David C. Leatherman, treasurer, said on Dec. 9. The fiscal year begins on Apr. 1.

Leatherman pointed out that expenditures amount to $1,984,497, or an increase of 1.5 percent after seven months, as compared with last year. Contributions for planned program as of Nov. 30 stood at $1,034,421 as compared to $1,082,955 in 1969.

The Compassion Fund, introduced in 1969 by Mennonite Board of Missions in cooperation with Mennonite General Conference, has accumulated $94,922 to date. Leatherman noted that the suggested $6 per member per year contribution is handled as above-budget giving. Compassion Funds, he said, are being used in black, Spanish-speaking, Indian, and Appalachian communities for both General Board and district conference projects that could not be carried out unless these funds become available. Projects are approved by the Minority Ministries Council working in cooperation with the Executive Committee of Mennonite Board of Missions.

*Missions Week receipts, the Christmas Sharing Fund, and individual year-end gifts usually offer encouragement as we enter a new calendar year," Leatherman said. "Meanwhile, our fiscal year almost ends before we can determine any financial trends that might necessitate adjustments in program. Therefore, we will move with caution and ask the brotherhood to work and pray with us."

Boat and Food Shipped to Pakistan

Mennonite Central Committee is responding to the devastating disaster of Nov. 12 and 13 in East Pakistan. Vernon Reimer, director for India, Pakistan, Nepal, and Afghanistan, made arrangements to go to the disaster area immediately from his base in Calcutta. Reimer is no stranger to working with disasters in that area, having responded to the 1963 and 1965 disasters. Almost every year cyclones move up the Bay of Bengal and ravage the 200 or more small islands located in the Delta region of the Ganges River. In a letter dated Nov. 24, Reimer reported that "this tidal wave reached 20 to 30 feet. It was almost four days before people in nearby Dacca were aware that such a serious tragedy had occurred." By Nov. 16, Reimer reported, "we read in Calcutta papers that 90,000 people had drowned. By Nov. 18 this figure was revised to 500,000. Some estimates were triple that number of deaths. After visiting the area, I can well understand that this may be the case. Relief is pouring in by planeloads from all over the world. India was the first country to promise help. The Pakistani people we met were very impressed with this gesture."

This low-lying coastal area of East Pakistan is tremendously overpopulated. In normal times the area has difficulty in feeding its population. "One of the reasons that so many people lost their lives," said Reimer, "is that many were in those areas for harvesting. They had an excellent crop and thousands had gone down for the harvesting when the unforeseen cyclone struck. Prior warnings were not given or taken seriously."

From his first investigatory visit to the disaster area, Vernon Reimer has requested funds, material aid supplies, and has transferred two Paxmen from the MCC team in Nepal to East Pakistan. MCC has sent one 16-foot aluminum boat and two outboard motors for disaster relief. Also, 26,250 pounds of canned chicken were sent to the disaster area. On Nov. 24, the MCC Executive Committee approved a $35,000 response to the disaster — including material aid purchases. If additional resources were needed, approval for these were scheduled for the Dec. 10 and 11 meeting of the MCC Executive Committee. The various Mennonite groups have been asked to contribute to this emergency need above their regular contributions to the work of MCC.

"The real problem at present," said Reimer, "is to get the relief supplies now piled up in Dacca out into the villages." In normal times communications in this area are uncertain and limited. Many of the small islands can be reached only by boat. This area is also known for its cumbersome government bureaucracy.

MCC has worked with the East Pakistan Christian Council (EPCC) in responding to previous disasters and is again coordinating its efforts at the present time with the EPCC.

MCC, through Vernon Reimer and several Paxmen, is seeking to provide the personnel needed to distribute its own resources and those from other agencies in close cooperation with the EPCC.

In closing his last letter, Reimer writes, "It is good to hear of the concern and willingness to help from all over the world. We need your prayers as we try our best to face the greatest hurdle of distributing the supplies to the sufferers."

The interest of MCC constituent bodies in providing help for the sufferers in East Pakistan is strong. Persons interested in helping should send their checks through the normal conference channels and they will be passed on to MCC. It is also possible to remit directly to MCC for those who wish to do so. Giving to the East Pakistan disaster should not displace normal year-end offerings by the churches for support of the broader program.

Forty Prisoners Graduate from Bible School

Forty prison inmates and eleven free men met for a Bible school graduation service in the federal maximum security prison unit near Atmore, Ala., on Nov. 3. The prisoners studied the Bible under three teachers: Leon Weber, Alvin Yoder, and Martin Weber, the full-time chaplain of the Atmore State Prison Farm. At the graduation service, the students gave the teachers a thank-you card with a drawing of a professor at a chalkboard. The card said, "In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves" (2 Timothy 2:25).

The four highest scores in the course received Bible dictionaries.

Several students accepted Christ during this term. One who registered just before the deadline came to Alvin Yoder the last week of Bible school and said, "I came to prison when I was seventeen. I've been here fourteen years; this is the first time I've been in chapel. I want to be a Christian."

200 Students Make Consecrations

It was during a chapel service that started in the usual ordinary way that more than 200 Goshen College students reconsecrated their lives to Jesus Christ.

David Shank, missionary to Belgium, who was speaking four times during the week of Nov. 16 to the morning assemblies on "The Spirit," spoke Thurs. morning, Nov. 19, on "The Shape of the Spirit."

He told the students that baptism by the Holy Spirit was likened to a "dove" baptism — not like that of "a hawk or a schizophrenic eagle clutching olive branches in one talon and arrows in the other." It was in the dove-baptism of Jesus of Nazareth that He was recognized as divine, the real "chip" off the block of the Father, and as Son, the highest, noblest, and most glorious title.

The Role of Servant

But Jesus' life ministry is marked more by the role of servant than Son. The Bible says it was of His own free will that He gave it all up and took the form of a servant — of the Word of Truth, of healing, of casting out of spirits. He befriended rich and poor, Pharisee and Zealot, rebel and Sadducee, doctors of law and adulterers, possessed and hungry, the crowds and the Twelve, and invited all into the kingdom.

Jesus, the shape of the Spirit, is terrible, purifying love. The Spirit is recognized not by worthiness, yet He speaks, not by activism, yet He is active; not in political manipulation, yet He transforms political structures. Such speaking, action, transformation, and judging of political and social and economic structures in the world then and now could only have ended in a cross — the ultimate shape of the Spirit.

The Tragedy of Missions

Commenting on the tragedy of missions, Shank said the day of "conquering nations for Christ" is finished. Western powers have conquered Asia and Africa economically and militarily and Christian mission was seen as a religious conquest and thus a distortion in the present time of history.

The shape of really Spirit-filled missions is the "servant-mission." This was the stance of the people filled with love that grew out of the "happening" of Pentecost. It is the stance of those today who would have the flexibility to "go out there" where their services are requested and needed.

Whether "out there" or on campus, the shape of the Spirit is marked by freedom to respond to the Spirit, becoming as servants, and "with a dove on your head and a flame in your heart."

Ready to Offer Themselves

"I have the conviction," Shank said, "that there are many fellows and girls right here on campus who are hungry and thirsty for God and His Holy Spirit. They desire to be servants in the way that we see Christ. They are ready to offer themselves to the work and leading of power of the Holy Spirit in their lives.

"Maybe we could have an offering this morning, where we would offer not our money — the Lord doesn’t want our money — but offer up ourselves to the Spirit, and open up our lives to Him, and in readiness to obey Him. If there are those like that here this morning, let them offer up themselves now and bring the offering forward."

Some 200 persons, including faculty and staff, went forward and knelt in front of the platform. In moving prayers, one spoke in Amharic and, immediately following, another in English made the same request for guidance and counsel. Neither was aware until afterward the exact similarity of their prayers.

Among those who responded during the week of services was a number of first-time commitments to Christ.

In a talk with Shank later, he reported commitment services with good response at Hesston College the week earlier and with his home congregation near Brussels, Belgium, the Sunday before he left for his current whirlwind speaking tour in North America on behalf of missions.

Material Aid Distributed in Bolivia

A few weeks ago when I was in Cochabamba, I was approached by a social action committee of the Evangelical Christian Union Church. This committee was made up of several Bolivian businessmen who were concerned that their national pastors, all of whom must gain their full support from their congregations, receive some help so as to have a better living. This group asked if it would be possible for MCC to help them with any type of material aid and they would pay any expenses involved.

This came at a time when I wanted to clear out our Cochabamba warehouse of material aid which consisted mainly of used clothing which I’d been keeping in case of disaster. With the new shipment of material aid already in customs in Cochabamba I felt no need to keep this old supply. Therefore, I offered to the committee used clothing and layette bundles, and they offered to buy some powdered milk.

This group made packages out of this material aid for each of their national pastors. The material aid was distributed to some 80 families involving over 350 people. Some people described this as the highlight of their convention and it sounded as though it was received with great gratitude by these pastors.

Following is a letter of gratitude from the social action committee:

Cochabamba, Bolivia
November 2, 1970
Dear Friends in Christ,

Christmas came early this year for our pastors of the Evangelical Christian Union here in Bolivia, because of the many things that you have sent. We wish you could have seen their faces as they opened their gifts of lovely quilts, clothes, soap, and toys.

These gifts that you have sent in the name of Christ will go to nearly every part of Bolivia. In the altiplano where it is very cold, in the lowlands where it is very hot and wet, and here in the valley where we have mild temperatures most of the year. How welcome these warm sweaters, quilts, and nice clothes and towels will be.

How can we thank you enough for all that you have done for the Bolivian pastors and their families? We can’t begin to, but we do want to say, "May God bless each one of you who had a part in sharing with our people here, and on behalf of each one of the pastors, thank you very much."

(Signed by ten members of the committee.)

and colleges accredited by the association,” he added.

Ellis Z. Zeiset, R. 3, Ephrata, Pa., was ordained deacon for the church congregation in Lancaster Conference, Nov. 29. John E. Hollinger and J. Paul Graybill were in charge.

The Southwest Mennonite Conference held its annual meetings Nov. 26-28 at the Sunnyslope Mennonite Church, Phoenix, Ariz. The delegate body elected the following persons to the Executive Committee: Donald E. Yoder, Conference Overseer; Roger Richer, Moderator; Jonas L. Hostetler, Director of Extension; Theron Weldy, Sec.; Samuel A. Spicher, Treas.

Two hundred alumni of Eastern Mennonite College pledged at least $10,000 in donations during a telefund campaign conducted recently in western Virginia, eastern Maryland, and Kentucky by Rockingham County alumni.

According to Harley R. Showalter, local campaign chairman, 70 percent of the 300 alumni contacted pledged to the fund. “Many more gave verbal support to the school, as well as unspecified pledge amounts,” he said.

“Success of our first telefund in this area is obvious,” said Carl Harman, director of alumni relations for the college. “Never before in the history of EMC have all alumni given more than $13,000 in one given drive.”

Special meetings: Fred Augsburger, Youngstown, Ohio, at Littitz, Pa., Jan. 20-27.

New members by baptism: eight at Souderton, Pa.; ten at Beth-El, Colorado Springs, Colo.; fifteen at Yellow Creek, Goshen, Ind.

The Tax Reform Act raises the income tax 90 percent limit on charitable contributions deduction to 50 percent of an individual’s adjusted gross income for taxable years beginning with 1970. This is an invitation to give more to the church and its work.

A Sharing Concerns Bible Conference is scheduled at Salem Mennonite Church, New Paris, Ind., Jan. 1, 2. Speakers include Dave Graber, Sanford Shelter, Marvin Ketcham, Lavern Swartz, Henry Diener, Dwaine Swartzendurber, and Thomas Miller. The concluding service will be a hymn sing and youth meeting, Sat. eve., at 7:00 p.m. Everyone is invited to these services.

Arlene Kreider recently completed a three-year term of service under EMBC in Addis Ababa as a worker in the Mennonite Bookstore and returned to the United States on Oct. 18. Her address is R. 2, Columbia, Pa. 17512.

The youth project of the EMBC New Haven (Conn.) Voluntary Service Unit experienced a new “first” as seven of the older community fellows the VS-ers work with attended the VS unit’s Bible study. Besides participating in the discussion, the youth indicated that they plan to return again. Jim Landis, a VS youth worker, is currently directing a discussion of the book, How to Be a Christian Without Being Religious.

Everett Metzler, Hong Kong director for Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, reports, “Our family is planning to participate in the annual Mennonite Central Committee Christmas distribution of Christmas bundles to about 1,900 children in the approximately 560 families that MCC serves. Afterward we are planning on a Christmas vacation in Macao—the Portuguese enclave across the Pearl River from Hong Kong.

An epidemic of cholera has kept Eastern Board missionaries in Ethiopia quite busy.

Marlin Nissley and Daniel Ness flew with an interpreter from Addis Ababa to a remote mountain clinic near Gololcha on Nov. 9 to vaccinate people who would not otherwise have had access to inoculation. After a 2 1/2-hour mile ride from the airstrip to the clinic, the missionaries vaccinated 1,532 persons on Nov. 10, 11.

The Nazareth Hospital staff has also been very busy giving cholera shots. Several teams were sent out from the Nazareth area; more than 100,000 persons have received shots.

Don Jacobs, Eastern Board missionary in Nairobi, Kenya, arrived in the United States on Sat., Nov. 28. He lectured on Africa at Malone College, Canton, Ohio; and served as resource person for an urban seminar sponsored in New York by Eastern Mennonite Seminary. He returned to Africa on Dec. 20.

George and Lois Zimmerman, Eastern Board missionaries in Honduras, arrived home on Nov. 27 for a three-month furlough. Their address is c/o J. Norman Brubaker, R. 1, McAlisterville, Pa. 17049.

Harold S. Stauffer, Lancaster, Pa., on Dec. 1 became Secretary of Overseas Missions for Eastern Board, Salunga, Pa. Paul N. Kraybill, Landisville, Pa., became Associate Secretary of Overseas Missions, with responsibility for Asia, Europe, and Haiti. Kraybill will give three-fourths time to his responsibilities as Executive Secretary for Church Organization.

Ira J. Buckwalter, Intercourse, Pa., on Dec. 1 became the General Secretary of Eastern Board, Salunga. Buckwalter will continue to carry some responsibilities in the Treasurer’s Office, and as Secretary of Institutions.

Norman G. Shenk, Mount Joy, Pa., will become Treasurer of Eastern Board on Jan. 1, 1971. He also serves as the Board’s Relief Secretary.

David C. Fretz, Mount Joy, Pa., has succeeded Janet Kreider as Editor of Volunteer, a monthly service release by Eastern Board.

Mrs. Ina Flisher, mother of India missionary Jake Flisher, passed away on Nov. 30 after a brief illness. Mr. and Mrs. Jake Flisher, currently on furlough and living at Kalona, Iowa, flew to Nampa, Idaho, for the funeral services. Flisher address: R. 1, Box 24, Kalona, Iowa 52247.

The Harvey Graber family from Brazil arrived in Chicago on Dec. 11 for a three-month furlough. Their address: c/o Elam Hochstetler, R. 1, Goshen, Ind. 46526. The John Bloughs from Brazil arrived in Chicago on Dec. 20 for a six-month furlough. Address: c/o Alvin Blough, Hesston, Kan. 67062.

A change in rental charges for the 80-minute feature film, “A Letter to Nancy,” produced by Concordia Films, is now in effect. The new rental charge is $25 instead of $37. Churches qualifying for subsidized rentals are now charged $15 instead of $20. This film and almost 300 additional film and filmstrip titles are available from Audiovisuals, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

The editorial, “One With — Yet Not Partaker,” in the Nov. 24 issue is excellent. Concerning the other, “Telling Lies to God,” I have a question: does the person who is easily hurt by criticism or by being ignored suffer from a self-opinion which is too high—or too low?

The Sacredness of the Commonplace

By Eugene Dinsmore Dolloff

He stopped instantly — frozen in his tracks. A few yards ahead, at the right of the path, a little tree was on fire. The flames crackled in the branches and circlets of smoke curled skyward. He saw the fire, felt the heat, but the tree was not consumed!

"What can this be?" exclaimed the surprised shepherd. "I've been around the base of this mountain scores of times, know every inch of the way, no place can be more common — just a dusty pathway in the desert. Nevertheless, I'll stop long enough to see why the tree is not consumed."

"Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." It was the voice of God speaking to a most surprised man, for in his thinking God never could be in such a "common" place.

Then the Eternal gave Moses his "marching orders," obedience to which was to mold the flow of history for many centuries. Seemingly no place could be more "common," than that desert wilderness, no task more ordinary than tending sheep. In reality the place was sacred — God was there.

At this point much of our thinking is "fussy," for with pathetic frequency men are victimized by the fallacy that life is divided into two watertight compartments, secular and sacred. It is fully agreed that famous shrines are "sacred places" — St. Anne de Beaupre, Canada; Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris; St. Peter's, Rome; the Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem. Also it is allowed that cemeteries and a few other places are "sacred."

But despite this grave misconception, life is all of one piece, nothing is common, all is sacred. This must be true since God is the Creator of all, God's handiwork is forever sacred. The poet understood,

"Day by day with souls that cringe and plot
We Sinai climb and know it not."

The following widely separated experiences will serve to illustrate this vital truth.

He was a desperately homesick youth. Having gravely wronged his brother, he fled for his life. He hurried hour after hour until, at day's end, exhausted, he was compelled to stop. He was hungry, but had no food; desperately lonely, but had no companions. He wanted God, but of course God, he thought, could not be in that distant, "common" place. He lay on the hard ground for his couch, rocks for his pillows, and covered himself over with a piece of star-studded sky.

In sickening loneliness he cried out, "This is the most God-forsaken place in the world!" He sobbed himself to sleep. As he slept he dreamed an amazing dream. He heard God speaking to him, making precious promises of peace and prosperity.

He awoke with a start, crying out, "Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not." Instantly that which a little while ago had seemed utterly "commonplace" was gilded with sacred glory.

Among rugged hills overlooking the Dead Sea is the cave, or more precisely the caves in which the renowned Dead Sea Scrolls were found. There, amid monastic conditions, "holy men" in dreary silence and rigorous self-denial, wrought that marvelous service. Abundant ruins of that monastic complex, still dramatically extant, reveal the devotion with which they penned those noble messages. One self-evident fact, impressing the person viewing the ruins, is that those men regarded their somber retreat as extremely sacred in comparison with “the outside world.”

Few men were more profoundly disappointed than Sir Launfal in his failure to find the Holy Grail. Tattered, disheveled, completely subdued in spirit, returning from the quest, he met a leper who asked for food and water. Hurrying to a nearby brook he filled the battered old pewter mug which swung from his belt and, together with a large half of his last piece of hard bread, presented it to the leper. Suddenly there was a surprising transformation, the old cup became the Holy Grail, and the “leper” was the Christ. Until that moment the place had been regarded as extremely “common,” now Sir Launfal knew it was sacred.

Mrs. Browning was keenly alive to the sacred character of the “commonplace,” as evidenced by how she lost “the little cares” and “the foolish fears.”

“Among the rustling of the corn,
Where drowsy poppies nod,
Where ill thoughts die and good are born —
Out in the fields with God.”

From “the little town of Bethlehem” one looks across low hills to see the Shepherds’ Field. No place appears more “commonplace” to the careless thinker, yet there it was, on the first Christmas, the angel of God brought the news of the birth of Christ, and the heavenly chorus sang the first Christmas carol. Common? To the contrary, supremely sacred.

Several times daily the devout Muslim spreads his prayer rug, kneels, and facing Mecca, prays to Allah. Why? To him Mecca is the sacred city, never realizing that the spot on which he knelt was, in God’s sight, equally sacred with Mecca.

I learned this astonishing truth in dramatic manner when, at the age of sixteen years, I was following a plow in the furrow of our old New Hampshire farm. It was a beautiful June day, birds singing blithely, a morning when one could exclaim, “God is in His heaven, all is well with the world.” I had stopped the horses for a brief rest, and was seated on the grass.

“My son, I want you for my service.” The voice was quiet, distinct, convincing. I looked up, expecting to see the one who had spoken.

Again the voice, “Son, I want you to spend your life in the ministry.” The call could be neither misunderstood nor avoided. God was there! Like the youth of the long-ago yesteryear I found myself saying audibly, “Surely the Lord is in this place and I knew it not!”

When visiting Joppa recently I recalled vividly Peter’s experience there. As he waited to eat, extremely hungry, he slept and dreamed. In his vision he beheld a massive sheet lowered from heaven, filled with “all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.”

“Rise, Peter; kill, and eat,” came the command.

“Not so, Lord,” said Peter, “for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean.” He spoke with finality.

“What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common,” came the quick response.

In those moments Peter’s thinking was changed. That rooftop had been “common,” now it was sacred, having been touched by the presence of the Eternal.

In Plymouth, Massachusetts, is a slight elevation looking out over the Atlantic. To the casual visitor no place could be more “common,” but for the thoughtful person it is forever sacred, the place to which God brought the Pilgrims to live, love, serve, and die.

Indeed all nature is and must be sacred. Says Harvey, “Nature is a volume of which God is the Author.” It is always and everywhere true that,

“Earth’s crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God.”

She was a typical Jewish maiden who, according to custom, was confined rather closely in a home which she considered most ordinary. One day she had a startling experience.

“Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee.” Without semblance of notice this message came to the girl. As she trembled in fear and wonder, the voice continued, “Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favour with God. . . . Thou shalt . . . bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus.” The air was filled with the presence of the Eternal, and the girl realized it was mantled in sacredness, her home was not “common” but sacred.

For our last picture let us think of Elisha in his wilderness cabin, surrounded by a “great host” of Syrian horsemen and chariots, seeking his destruction. Beholding the grave danger, his servant’s heart became as water, and he cried out, “Alas, my master! how shall we do?”

“Lord . . . open his eyes,” prayed the venerable prophet. And God opened his eyes, and the young man saw “the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.”

This is most suggestive. One of man’s deepest needs is to have his eyes opened that he may see and understand that all places are sacred. This discovery will surely alter the quality and dimensions of any person’s life.

Glorious will be the day when the housewife in the kitchen, the farmer with his acres, the businessman in his office, the teacher with her pupils, the skipper with his ship, and all others in every phase of life, shall know they are always in “sacred places,” places which bear and wear the watermark of God.

Wise is the one who walks softly before God, in all places, faithfully honoring the divine directive, “Be still, and know that I am God.”

New Year's Prayer

Oh, Voice whose words cannot be heard
In earthquake's thunderous shocks
Thou Voice that drew faith's father on
But not from rending rocks,
Yet Thou whose utterance can be heard
By men today, speak Thou!

No voice from a tempestuous wind
Has caused man's faith to hear
Tho' blundering billows rock his boat
No answer there — but fear.
Thou Voice who made the storm to calm
Renew our faith, draw near.

No furious flame alone can claim
A voice that spurs faith on.
The backward look sees hopes unmet
And then one's strength is gone.
Oh, Voice of Power, tho' still, tho' small,
Raise up our faith to dawn.

Tho' earthquake's anger, wind, or fire
May break to hide Thy face,
Tho' Satan's angry calls be loud
To stop or slow our pace,
Let us move forward step by step
In answer to Thy grace.

Oh, give us ears to hear the Voice
That calls true faith today,
And let our hearts be tuned, oh God!
Applying what You say
To thoughts, and words and deeds and power,
Oh, lead us on, we pray!

"Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow" (Jas. 4:14).

The most certain thing in life is life's uncertainty. Scripture says we should say "if the Lord wills" we shall go into the city tomorrow, and "continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain." In other words we do not know what is ahead even the rest of today. When we leave home in the morning we do not know that we will come back. When our children leave for school we do not know if we shall see them alive again. This means we ought always part with love expressed and encouragement given.

Life is like "a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vaniseth away." Yet we do, as Christians, have an assured hope. We know in whom we believe and we are persuaded that God is able to keep that which we have committed unto Him till the last day. Therefore we commit ourselves and our families to God. Therefore we put our trust in Him. And though all fades away, the world, friends, and family our hope abides.

It's good that we do not know what each tomorrow holds. It's better far to put our trust in God and know that He holds each tomorrow.

To Get Involved

A friend of ours, a former student at Goshen who went on to Princeton and became a man of great influence, was known for his love for people. While he was at Princeton it was said that he would put on old clothes, go out and sit on a curb with his arms around a transient, and talk of the love of God.

That is what Jesus Christ did. He put on our old clothes of flesh, sat down on the curb of our battered world, put His arm around us, and said,

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." —

When mothers brought their children to sit on His lap, His busy disciples could have shuttled them away, had He not said, "Stop! These children are special with the Father. They are people. I have time for children."

When He attended a party with sinners, His shocked friends exclaimed, "Dear, dear!" But He said, "Don't you understand yet that I came into the world to save sinners, not goody-goodys? I came to serve the sick, the broken-hearted, the down-and-outers, and the up-and-outers. I came to get involved with people — all kinds of people. I have all the time there is. My meat is to do the will of My Father, who is love."

Marks of a Peacemaker

We can become so caught up with the currents around us that we lose our sense of balance. The prevailing attitudes become our attitudes. In a subtle way we sometimes without realization imitate the same spirit we criticize in others. Particularly is this true in our position on peace. We may try to call people to peace and love in most unpeaceful and unloving ways.

If our peace witness is to count in the long run and remain biblical, certain things must characterize such a witness.

First, we must maintain a sincere spirit of humility. A peacemaker is not arrogant or proud. When we look at our own failures at peacemaking and peace-keeping our record is rather poor. As one observer said, "Mennonites don't believe in fighting except among themselves." The test of peacemaking is whether we are really peacemakers among those close to us.

So we may preach loud and long about the warmongers of the state yet be all the time creating havoc and hatred within our own fellowship and family. Such a spirit negates what we try to say or do.

In any area of life we begin to make progress when we first admit our own failures and inadequacy and then in humility seek by life to witness to something better.

Understandably no one is much influenced for peace by the belligerent, brash, proud person who calls himself a peacemaker merely because he has developed an excellence in denouncing the warmongers. Peacemaking always starts with a sense of humility and repentance on the part of the peacemaker. In this sense many peace movements today are unchristian.

Second, if our peace witness is to be biblical and lasting we must seek in every situation to be redemptive. This applies to both friend and foe. Sometimes there seems to be almost a sense of glee when those whom we dislike are put to shame or suffer loss. We may claim to be greatly concerned about the redemption of the South Vietnamese but build up hate toward the hawk in our congress or neighborhood. This is wrong. All killing is wrong whether it be the killing of a communist, a South Vietnamese, or the assassination of the president's character.

So the Christian cannot feel satisfaction or joy when even enemies suffer or are defamed. Christian love is to reach to all. In much of the talk about peace today, the spirit of the Anabaptist, Dirk Willems, who returned over the ice to save his enemy from drowning, even though it meant his own death, is completely missing.

If we love only those who love us we are no better than the heathen. And if we are inclined to feel good when harm of any kind comes to even our enemy we better check again if we are really the peacemakers we claim to be. There is much in many present peace movements with destruction, name-calling, and building of alienations which speaks more of hatred than redemption.

Third, we must maintain more of a spirit of prayer than of criticism. As Mennonites we seem to be developing an expertise in speaking against national leadership in particular. We need, of course, to bear witness against wrong. The very fact that we believe in separation of church and state means a responsibility for evaluation and witness. Yet the Scripture calls us to "Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor your emperor" (1 Pet. 2:17).

We are told to pray for leadership. "First of all, then, I urge that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings be made for all men, for kings and all who are in high positions, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, godly and respectful in every way. This is good, and it is acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:1-4).

In our feelings toward those in authority this passage is a guide. This must be our basic approach rather than caustic, disrespectful, and derogatory remarks. Our condemnation of leaders can so easily become greater than our concern. Our denunciation of wrong can so easily become greater than our declaration of right. Our placards can so easily outnumber our prayers. When this happens we are wrong.

Finally, we need to keep the perspective Peter presents in 1 Peter 2:21-23. "For to this you have been called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, that you should follow in his steps. He committed no sin; no guile was found on his lips. When he was reviled, he did not revile in return; when he suffered, he did not threaten; but he trusted to him who judges justly." Here is the method of submission about which little is said today.

Toyohiko Kagawa wrote:

"The principle of absolute nonresistance started with the idea that it is better to mobilize God than to exert oneself; that is to say, it made God's intervention the basis of morality. Just for this reason I advocate nonresisting love. The principle of nonresistance cannot be supported with human power alone. Tolstoy says that God will surely avenge, and without that faith everybody will resist. Since God's power is greater than ours, we leave the issue to God. Those who observe this technique of love, of righteousness, and of submission, are assured of a victory. This is a truth that the history of the past 2,000 years validates. The fall of the Roman Empire and the triumph of Christ are examples of this fact.

"God saves even sinners. If there were no salvation, nonresistance would be a folly. In the interest of salvation, therefore, we deny violence. This sentiment is expressed in Jesus' Sermon on the Mount." — D.
Biblical Basis of Christian Brotherhood

By John R. Mumaw

In this message I propose touching on some of the current issues we face in carrying out the mission of the church in today’s world. More particularly I want to identify those issues that affect the life of the church. In doing this I feel deeply the need for a biblical basis. As a backdrop for our discussion I want to submit a brief exposition from the fifteenth chapter of Romans. This passage of Scripture deals directly with various aspects of the life of the church in terms of Christian brotherhood. I will draw from this chapter basic principles involved in the practice of Christian brotherhood.

But let us first review briefly the nature of the church. It is a community of faith issuing in a fellowship of redeemed people. As such the church holds a common body of beliefs in which the experience of faith is shared at the deep levels of spiritual experience. It provides a common life in experience with Christ, being identified with Him both in death to sin and in resurrection to life. It is made up of people who express in their daily discipleship a common commitment to the Scriptures as a rule of faith and life. In this common obedience to the will of God each believer holds respect for all the saints who share in the common salvation.

Brotherhood expressions are more than a great ideal; they are realities well within reach of the corporate experience of believers. There is, however, a rather general condition in the life of the total church which gives us great pause today. I refer to a polarization of thought and practice. This can be defined as the taking of opposite or extreme views on any issue. When such diverse positions are taken it affects seriously the life of the church. This is particularly true when we encounter extremism in both directions.

Basic Principles in the Practice of Brotherhood

Brotherhood is practiced in mutual concern (Rom. 15:1). “Shoulder the burden of the doubts and qualms of others.” The strong are to bear the infirmities of the weak. When infirmity afflicts a brother, others feel it too. When limitations circumscribe a brother’s child it becomes the concern of the whole church. When the care of an afflicted person becomes a demanding burden upon one family other families offer to help. When anxiety afflicts a person resources of sympathy and support are found within the brotherhood. This kind of concern is expressed by sharing openly in moral and financial support. We will find ways of expressing the care we have for each other by giving of ourselves to the needs of others. Happy is the man who cares!

Brotherhood is practiced in mutual consideration (vv. 2, 3). “Our actions should mean the good of others.” A sincere effort to be brothers will find channels of expression that give consideration to the needs of others. Everyone seeks ways to please his brother. When a neighbor faces difficult circumstances the Christian brother tries to alleviate his brother’s problems. When a difficult task is assigned that burden is shared with others. When a person is frustrated in affairs that he cannot change a brother will come to his aid. It is important, therefore, to have the church arrange settings where primary personal relationships can be established. There need to be occasions for direct communication between brethren. This kind of community spirit establishes bonds of loyalty to a common faith. We belong to each other. Unselfish service that pleases another is an authentic expression of brotherhood. Happy is the person who pleases others!

Brotherhood is practiced by sharing mutual aspirations (vv. 5, 6). Brethren have “a mind united toward one another because of your common loyalty to Jesus Christ.” In this way Christians relate corporately to a God of patience and consolation and seek to follow common aspirations. Individual desires are tempered by the judgment of others. Aspirations are strengthened by the hope others inspire in us. They are upheld by oneness of purpose, especially in a conscious effort to glorify God. This is basic to Christian community. Preaching and teaching, therefore, take on a supportive role to nurture a common obedience of faith. In all the various functions of the church deference is given to the authority of Scriptures with the hope that the entire brotherhood finds a common purpose to fulfill. Happy is the person who shares the will of God!

Brotherhood is practiced by mutual acceptance (vv. 7-13). These verses are tremendously important in today’s world. One translator puts it this way, “Open your hearts to one another as Christ has opened his heart to you.” We are to receive one another as persons. Christ is no respecter of persons; Christ was no selector of persons; and was no rejecter of persons. We are to respect one another as persons, regardless of how we feel about their behavior. This acceptance of one another is to be expressed in sharing life at all levels of significance. This is the means by which social barriers, economic barriers, racial barriers, and ethnic barriers are broken down. May I put in just a word for some who are a little different from the rest of us. I refer to the mentally handicapped. Recently in a seminar at Laurelville Church Center we heard Doctor Hayes say there is no such thing as a retarded person. Rather than shun those among us who are retarded we should accept them as persons, with their limitations, of course. Happy is the person who feels accepted!

Brotherhood is practiced in mutual admonition (v. 14). We should be "capable of keeping one another on the right road." This is admonition. How do we do this? Being able to admonish one another requires a great deal of openness to each other, and to the truth. In order to be able to express our concerns to each other we need to gain knowledge sufficient to understand others, to see things from their point of view. We must find ways of overcoming the barriers that rise because of our displeasing one another. Happy is the person who is open to admonition!

Brotherhood is practiced in mutual sharing (vv. 25-29). "Look after the welfare of the Christians." We are ministers of help, particularly to the saints who are in need. We share in the restrictions that may be imposed upon a brother by circumstances. It may not be his fault that he is in financial need; it may not be his fault that he is in physical need. We share in these needs whatever eventuality gives rise to it. Suffering from misfortune calls for the kind of brotherhood and feeling that provides encouragement. It's not only a material sharing, it is also a spiritual sharing. Members of a Christian community are serving in the heavenly vocation for the good of others. Happy is the person who shares!

Brotherhood is practiced in mutual intercession (vv. 30-33). "For the love we bear one another in the Spirit," pray for them. We "strive together in prayer." Are we willing to accept the ministry of intercession? Are we willing to cultivate fellowship through prayer, praying for each other?

Prayers of intercession always develop interest in others. They cultivate love, the kind of brotherly feeling that is characterized by agape. Prayers of intercession also affect the course of events. It would be better to make more appeals to our heavenly Father than to the government. "More things," as Tennyson said, "are wrought through prayer than this world dreams of." Happy is the person who prays!

Points of Polarization

We will now try to analyze the polarization that has taken place within the Mennonite Church. Reference to polarization means the presence of extreme positions. While some points are made rather extreme others represent actual conditions among us. Polarization takes place in matters where we do not agree. Opposite opinions are cast in molds of conviction that create tension.

Peace Positions — Political Action vs Biblical Submission. Polarization has found expression in this area of faith and practice at a time when a unified witness to nonresistance is sorely needed. There are advocates of peace who claim a Christian obligation to participate in political action and/or private resistance to the "system." Others take a passive attitude in submission to the government exercising civil disobedience only at the point of becoming involved personally in military action. The widest difference of opinion occurs at the point of giving public expression to our peace position. Some deep feelings have been generated over individual testimony being given as a "Mennonite position" which did not voice the official statement on nonresistance or represent the total conviction of the group involved. This conflict of opinion is to be regretted. The Mennonite position on war has come to be known generally as a biblical conscience expressing itself apart from political implications. Today we are not sure what we believe.

The term nonresistance, although negative in its connotation, remains an expression of our desire for peace and designates in particular a personal peaceful attitude toward becoming involved in war and other forms of violence. The problem of having a negative label with the use of the term nonresistance has been with us ever since World War I. Today's tension over it is more severe and the polarization regarding the Christian's obligation in the nonresistant faith is more offensive. Whereas some church leaders seek to influence government leaders in the administration of national affairs others limit their attempts to influence the course of history through prayer. While some are expressing opinions on how to organize the suppression of violence others are supporting evangelistic efforts directed toward saving souls.

The question we face seriously today is to find agreement on what nonresistance means and how to be the kind of peacemakers Jesus calls to Christian discipleship How can we come together on the peace issue? How can we give a consistent testimony to the principle of peace?

Witness — Social Action vs Individual Commitments. Social action is an attempt to fulfill the Christian responsibility to the contemporary human stress by attempting to change social structures. A strong segment of the church believes the social aspects of the gospel are secondary to the spiritual answers to human need. Some people express an almost irresponsible demand for getting involved where the action is. It is claimed that where things are happening there God is at work. They assume that a Christian who participates in world happenings is working in the kingdom of God. Others are not sure whether it is God or Satan working "out there." They insist on exercising discernment in each case and on discovering how such participation can be an act of God's will. They have an urgent desire to avoid abetting Satanic powers and purposes.

Piety — Encounter vs Fellowship. At first thought one might argue for agreement on this point. However, a careful analysis of concept and practice comes through with another polarity. We have within the church people who want to express their devotion to God in a lifestyle that relies upon a modified form of humanism. To them participation in the social and political struggles of our times is being spiritual. At the other extremity of the continuum is the demand for an ecstatic experience that gives a high priority to feeling. This view calls for emotional settings that give prominence to charismatic response. The one holds respect for God as the Supreme Being and the other regards Holy Spirit manifestations as the ultimate reach of piety. Somewhere in between these extremes we ought to be able to find a common experience of fellowship with God which represents a truly biblical piety.

Change — Innovation vs Traditionalism. We have strong social and ecclesiastical pressures calling for change. The spirit of aggression drives on against the spirit of containment. Church leaders have come into prominence who are calling for "relevance," "involvement," "action," and "change." Others hold tenaciously to the traditional way of doing things giving to former methods an aura of sacredness. Some people want to change because it is new. Others hold to the old because it is familiar. The innovator will experiment freely whereas the traditionalist is unwilling to risk a trial run. Some people are quick to imitate the popular trend while others hold general practices suspect. Some hold that we have a commitment to the gospel and to Christ in terms of sharing our understanding of the meanings of the kingdom within and do not want to get involved in so-called social action.

Nonconformity — Isolation vs Accommodation. Another point of polarization has to do with expressions of nonconformity. The issue comes into focus when we discuss dress forms, standards of modesty, recreation activities, vocational pursuits and relationships, business practices, and social ethics. It is difficult to resolve the tension that exists between the extremes of position, which on the one hand allows for a great deal of flexibility and the other sets up rigid requirements. Freedom to indulge in modern recreational activities is conditioned in the name of Christian liberty while being condemned by others as license to sin.

Church Discipline — Specific Requirements vs Studied Accommodation. A sixth point of polarization has to do with church discipline. The two extremes can be identified as legalism and permissiveness. We have found tension at the point where there was a strict adherence to certain prescribed forms and procedures of administration, as over against a broad tolerance which relies upon the individual conscience. The one expects uniformity whereas the other promotes diversity. The tension arises from a threat to cherished practices and the feeling of infringement upon personal rights.

Education — Ecclesiastical Purpose vs Academic Freedom. The seventh issue has to do with our educational program. This finds expression in purposes for education, and the extent of educational pursuit, with philosophy of education, and with the administration of educational programs. There is a wide divergence of opinions on these points.

Communication — Maintain Traditional Forms vs Baptize Secular Forms. We are also polarized over methods of communication. What shall we do with drama as a means of expressing religious ideas? To what extent may this invade our religious services? We are in disagreement over rock music, and other modern forms of expression. To what extent can folk singing be used for worship? Are such expressions intended to be a worship experience? At the other extreme are the traditional forms in which there is no variety in forms of worship.

Role of Conference — Legislative vs Advisory. Another point of tension is over the role of conference. Is it legislative or is it advisory? Does it have mandatory powers or does it serve merely as a forum for discussion of current issues? The problem exists at the point of representative leadership making decisions affecting the practice of people who have not shared in voting on the question. Does conference have the final authority in matters pertaining to practice or is that solely the prerogative of the district? of the congregation? of the individual? We have some evident disagreement on this point.

Ordinances — Regularized Observances vs Optional Obedience. Another point of polarization is related to the practice of ordinances. The place and time of woman's wearing of the veil, stands in question. The frequency of observing the holy kiss varies among us. The application of the principle of close communion is widely different. The wedding sacraments permitted at marriage ceremonies, including the wedding band, have a wide divergence of approval and disapproval. These factors are all in tension among our members and we have not found the means of drawing together the polarization of thought and practice related to them.

Christian Practices — Uniformity vs Diversity. Strain within the brotherhood emerges with the polarization of views about Christian practices. In our historical background there has been a great variety of efforts made for a variety of reasons, to achieve uniformity of practice throughout the church. The response from the brotherhood to these efforts was diverse and uneven in expressions of conviction. Today this point stands in even wider polarization. Some people consider it a violation of conscience to be affiliated with persons who are unwilling to conform uniformly to adopted standards. On the other hand some people take the position that uniformity is impracticable and assume that diversity is desirable. And so we are torn apart both in feeling and practice.

Use of the Bible — Biblicism vs Secularism. The historic position of the Mennonite Church with reference to acceptance of the Bible as the Word of God has been identified as a wholesome biblicism. The Anabaptist tradition followed a line of biblical interpretation that accepted literally the teachings of the New Testament as being applicable to contemporary issues in each generation. Through the centuries various forms of deviation from this position have appeared under such labels as liberalism, higher criticism, modernism, and now secularism. The subtle influence of the latter has modified the current views of biblical interpretation. The church has been polarized on this and other issues such as the use of modern versions, commentaries, and other biblical literature.

Causes of Polarization

It is not easy to identify causes without running the risk of making arbitrary judgments. An attempt to relate current practices to foregoing action is subject to sharp disagreement and may induce dissent. It is obvious, however, that the church cannot grow in strength of faith and effectiveness in witness where disunity prevails. Extremism and tension are always liabilities to church growth. So at the risk of being charged with prejudice and misinterpretation of intention it seems expedient to attempt a limited analysis of these causes
Indifference. One of the most common causes of polarization is indifference to the circumstances and needs of others. Such an attitude is sub-Christian even at the highest level of its tolerance. We cannot be brothers and have no concern about what individual action does to another. The attitude does not need to be articulated for it is communicated by the way a brother's conviction is treated.

Insensitivity. Another cause of polarization is insensitivity to the effect administrative decisions and demands have upon the personhood of others. Administrators who build their own empires of interest at the expense of personal feelings and judgments of those affected by the decision lay the ground for later misapprehensions and even lapse of faith within the brotherhood. It tends to drive people away from each other. It is one of the deep causes of difficulty in achieving unity.

Misunderstanding. Many times the polarization of thought can be traced to a failure to see the historical perspective, especially in trying to cope with current issues emerging with the "now" generation. It becomes evident in philosophical expressions involving biblical interpretation and application. We've gone into opposite directions in our understanding of what is meant by the inspired Word of God and of how we apply biblical principles to common life. There is a tendency to select verses of Scripture that fit to our own particular theory or point of view. There is a tendency to look at one particular aspect of historical practice without taking into account the total implications. As an illustration we cite reference to nonconformity of the past as something to be discarded, and let it stand as referring only to the dress question. Nonconformity, as I have known it to be taught and practiced through these forty years or more in the work of the church, has encompassed far more than just dress. When one caricatures nonconformity as being a dress issue, he has misread history and has misinterpreted it. Any attempt to face the implications of a modern issue needs a broad historical and biblical perspective.

Communication. Another cause of polarization is the closed lines of communication with brethren refusing to hear and respect each other's views. We rely too much upon preconceived notions. On the other hand, there are among us those who are relying too heavily upon psychological and sociological solutions to meet current problems and issues. How can we get back to a common biblical basis? We have been influenced by contemporary theological trends, which select portions of Scripture that are suitable to stated purposes, and to the neglect of others, finding rationales with which to justify our positions. We need to find and renew our position of biblicism in the life of the church.

Permissiveness. Another cause of polarization is permissive attitudes coming in conflict with strict disciplinary measures. Some take license as a reaction against legalism and offend at the point of disobedience to Scripture. The tendency to obscure distinctiveness in order to feel accepted by the general society has met with strong opposition. Misunderstandings of the cost of discipleship have drawn lines of division that are hard to reconcile. Those who hold to sharp separation in all aspects of life, including dress, are distressed over the accommodations to popular trends. This applies both ways in attitudes toward vocation and toward participation in civic affairs. There are those who say we need a broad exposure to world society and others are insisting on a tight isolation from it.

Independence. Another cause of polarization is the growing sense of independence. Modern affluence has given rise to feelings and practice of independence which tend to stratify members of the church on one hand and to dissipate feelings of brotherhood on the other. When wealth creates a class distinction within the church the wedge of prejudice is driven deep. When people find their security in property and other material assets they feel little tangible need for the brotherhood. The whole system of finances in the American economy tends to dissipate the bonds of brotherhood and creates in members of the church less need for each other.

Individualism. We have been taught to live by an enlightened conscience. In our background of nurture we have been led to believe that membership in an organization makes us party to all that is done by the executive body and to the acts of all other members. This kind of guilt by association has given rise to many divisions. We have equated fellowship with uniformity.

Prayerlessness. Another reason for polarization within the church is a failure to labor together in prayer. It has been too easy to write off the labors of intercession as being irrelevant. Or among those who really believe in it there are too many who allow the "cares of this world" to crowd in upon time needed to pray. And what is more, when occasions are planned for brethren to pray together too few have the time or the will to do so. We may have been unduly influenced by the promoters of activism who say, "Go where the action is; get out of your closets and do something about it!" Perhaps this is more of a common fault than it is a polarization. At least the refusal to participate keeps people apart.

The Promotion of Brotherhood

This leaves us with the problem of knowing how to find a way of dissolving the extremism that separates us. This is no one-way street. If we are to resolve the problem of polarization there must be a coming together on biblical grounds where our common faith is mingled with expressions of Christian discipleship. As we look at the extreme ends of opinion on these issues we have no use for the demands that emerge from an "either-or" position. Rather it must be a mingling of the best out of each position.

We all need each other! No one of us has the edge on truth or wisdom. We must learn from each other. We must hear each other. We must admonish each other and pray with each other. We return to the outline from Romans fifteen and speak in terms of the church as a community of faith.

The church is a caring community. We need to cultivate caring about what happens to each other. This is Christian. Any action that is taken in conference district, or congregation needs to bear in mind, "what this action does to others." So often we have thought in terms of our own interests and convictions and become self-protective at any point of The church is a healing community. I referred earlier to mutual consideration. We have to find means of reconciliation where tension exists. It is a matter of practicing confession and forgiveness. We need settings where confession and forgiveness can take place easily. This calls for humility and openness.

The church is a believing community. I think we will have to reestablish the importance of Bible study, and create settings of fellowship where we worship with the Word. When the Bible becomes a real companion of our living, the real guide of our behavior, we can expect to be drawn together. We need more time and places where we share together in the Word.

The church is an understanding community. This is made possible only through mutual acceptance. We must develop forms of discussion in which we are able to talk together about things in which we disagree. When this is done in the spirit of brotherhood we can respect each other for what we are, even though we may disagree. This element of brotherhood needs cultivation.

The church is a disciplining community. Mutual admonition is certainly a part of this function. We have to develop an openness to hear each other in terms of admonition, and to caution ourselves against defensiveness. We are so prone to defend our own position, our own feelings, and our own actions. The Christian has to rise above that and find a way of being more objective where he is willing to consider how others feel in matters of discipline. But that there must be discipline, is not open to question. The church is no church if it is not disciplined. It calls for self-discipline and community disciplines, however it is administered. Many people have reacted against the way in which certain disciplines have been applied, and have moved so far away that the conviction to discipline has been lost.

The church is a sharing community. We must bear each other’s burdens whether they be emotional burdens, physical burdens, or financial burdens. As we share, whether it is through our aid plans or through voluntary giving, the sharing principle is Christian. We must find more ways of sharing.

The church is a praying community. My closing appeal is that we give more time to prayer, intercessory prayer. Let us strive together through prayer. We face the strongholds of principalities and powers in our culture and society, the like of which no other generation has seen. This calls for double effort on our knees. People who pray together can stay together.

In conclusion, let me appeal to each one to do all he can to practice brotherhood. Let this be a point in our history where we resolve to find a way to work together at the problem of polarization. Let us remember that brotherhood must be experienced to be real. It also has to be expressed to be valid. It must be extended to others to be authentic.

"I Got High with a Little Help from My Friends," the title of a lyric by the Beatles, is one of many contemporary rock songs which have references to drugs, says Henrec L. Barnette, professor of Christian ethics at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky. Speaking at a recent conference on "The Drug Crisis in the Church" sponsored by the Southern Baptist Christian Life Commission, Barnette observed that he did not know whether these references encourage drug usage, but asserted that "young people tend to identify with such performers."...

A blistering attack against the proposed legalization of pornography was made by a psychiatrist who opposes the findings of the Presidential Commission on Obscenity and Pornography.

Dr. Natalie Shainess of New York was one of the first witnesses called before the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Postal Operations. The subcommittee was gathering material to use in a brief to the Supreme Court asking that pornography be suppressed.

Dr. Shainess argued that the commission is wrong in saying "a little pornography may be a good thing."

She asked: "Is a little rape a good thing? Is a little murder a good thing? Is a little nuclear bombing a good thing? Is a little poison a good thing? Why, then, is a little pornography a good thing?"

Among the commission's proposals was one asking that consenting adults be allowed to purchase sexually explicit material.

The report has caused a national furor. President Nixon called it a "morally bankrupt document." The Senate condemned it in a 60-5 vote. Religious opinion has been highly mixed, with some saying that overpermissiveness carries the seeds of its own destruction.

Roland R. Hegstad, editor of the 500,000 circulation magazine Liberty, warned in a speech in Portland, Ore., that tax aid to church schools would bring public control to those schools. He said that parochial schools accepting tax aid will have to open their books to public officials, hire teachers without regard to their beliefs and affiliations, drop compulsory religious services, end quotas on students from outside the sponsoring church, and eliminate the religious permeation of the curriculum.

"The issue," Hegstad concluded, is "does a school want to be a public school, administrated by public officials, or a church-related school supported and controlled by the church and upholding church standards?"

The Nazarene Preacher states that the way the pastor comes to the platform can be exceedingly meaningful in setting a proper tone for the service. If he rushes onto the platform with a handful of notes and a worried look, the whole service may suffer spiritual dyspepsia. Involuntarily the people will feel their pastor is unprepared. They will wonder if he might forget some other important thing, since it seems evident that he only collected his thoughts at the last minute. Some methodical persons will wonder what he has been doing all week and what they are paying him for, anyway. Couldn't he at least have given some prethought to the order of the service, so that he could have appeared calm when he came to the platform?"

The American Friends Service Committee's Peace Education Committee has put out a distinguished series of mini-books on current issues during the past five years. This volume is added to a series which has studied The Draft, Vietnam, China and In Place of War: An Inquiry into Nonviolent National Defense. Everyone interested in the world of today and concerned about humane, intelligent, and Christian insights would do well to read each of these.

Anatomy of Anti-Communism explores what has become the prevailing American understanding of reality, the national ideology of the Cold War era. With devastating clarity, the authors (there are few books so successfully written by a committee) show the roots of this American hysteria, how it has affected American life and foreign policy, how it views the world, and what we might be able to do about it.

An excellent book which should be read by all North Americans, especially by Christians who have used the Communist boogeyman to defend their own positions. Fine for church libraries.—John A. Lapp.

Don't Sleep Through the Revolution, by Paul S. Rees. Word Books. 1969. 130 pp. $2.95

Billy Graham has written the foreword to this book. His words may be the best recommendation and the needed stimulation for busy people to pick it up. Let Graham whet your appetite: "Paul Rees has written many other books, and they have been enthusiastically received by the Christian community. But in my opinion, this is his best work — partially because it was meant to be a book. . . . Many of these articles are controversial — they were meant to be! It was Dr. Rees' intention to arouse evangelicals out of their apathy and indifference. In my judgment he has superbly done just that."

The spiritual life of the author comes through in his unique writing style in these forty-three brief but potent chapters. He deals with many themes and current concerns under six major headings. This reviewer will not speak to all of these chapters — but just to highlight one that is very much on the minds of God's people today. In the chapter on revolution he deals with the problem of social action that seems to be dividing the Christian church. He quotes one viewpoint and then answers it: "Eternity is more important than time and the soul more valuable than the body. Let's not get sidetracked in any social improvement schemes. Here precisely is where the evangelical community is in grave danger of committing a fatal blunder. The sentiment expressed is true, but it is irrelevant, because it leaves us unwilling to identify with the 'revolution of rising expectations.' We are reluctant to give it our blessing. We are loath to say that God's hand is in it. We have developed a theological neurosis in which we are nervously unwilling to combine the social insights of Old Testament prophets with the gospel witness of New Testament apostles."

A Place to Stand, by Elton Trueblood. Harper. 1969. 128 pp. $2.95

Elton Trueblood is in this book our American C. S. Lewis. He is disarmingly candid in his confession of faith. I am immeasurably helped by his book for the same reason he says he was helped by G. K. Chesterton — namely, because his faith, whether in miracles or other Christian doctrines, is so unapologetic. This book is a defense of a frankly supernatural view of life and the world.

Dr. Trueblood's profound acquaintance with the world's great philosophies does not complicate the presentation of his material but rather illustrates it with restraint and aptness. The author is convinced that there is an objective truth about everything and in this respect he is mercilessly scientific in his attitude and search. But his view is far more comprehensive than the faddist science that is the religion not so much of the scientists as of their idolizing followers.

He places the current emphasis upon service to mankind in its only safe and proper context, that of equal concern for sound doctrine. In this book we are shown with a simplicity that is eloquent and profound that it is possible without contradiction or confusion to hold a Christian position which is both evangelical and rational.

This would be an excellent gift for a high school or college student or for any adult Christian whose involvement in the world tends at times to erode the clarity and certainty of this faith. It would provide a first-rate group study book. Excellent for church libraries.—Gerald C. Studer.

Among the mounting number of books on Vietnam this book stands in a class alone. It describes how the people in Washington made and are making decisions about the war.

The book is written in an informal style enriched with enough specifics about people and events to give the book authenticity. The author's reports of personal contacts with men in high places add an interesting dimension. Henry Brandon has studied the Vietnam situation in depth. His analyses of the larger determining forces at work in governmental policy making are perceptive and skillfully sketched. Deep-seated differences about the role of military power in determining political policy are clearly reflected. The danger of government leaders isolating themselves or of receiving only one-sided counsel comes through loud and clear.

This is a balanced, sobering, and significant book and it is a must reading for informed and concerned citizens. The lessons — for the U.S. and the world — are visible at many points. Ours and the world's future may well be determined to a large degree by our capacity to learn the needed lessons. Excellent for church libraries where the members are concerned with today's issues.

— Atlee Beechy.

This book will be a shock to anyone en- amored with the notion that the United States is a peaceful and friendly country. Here is a book which realistically discusses, with ample documentation, the preparations for a war by pestilence, by asphyxiation, and by defoliation. These preparations constitute a folly the United States public can no longer ignore. McCarthy, a congressman (D-New York) with a crusading concern about these matters, analyzes our chemical-biological warfare program: our stockpiles, our research, our crude accidents and subsequent cover-up, the ominous future. McCarthy's well-written book traces the history of our CBW program, examines our huge secret reserves of chemical and biological weapons and proposes a program for controlling such stockpiles.

I recommend this book. It is especially important for those who are tempted to think that the four horsemen of the apocalypse no longer strut around on the world's stage as they once did not too long ago. Recommended for church libraries.—Carl S. Keener.
German Mennonite Peace Committee Votes for Curitiba

The German Mennonite Peace Committee sponsored an informational meeting at the Thomashof Oct. 23-25 to discuss the Ninth Mennonite World Conference planned for Curitiba, Brazil. Among the 32 participants from Germany, Holland, and France were also three members of the Presidium of the Ninth Mennonite World Conference and seven Mennonites from Paraguay and Brazil who are working or studying in Europe. Willi Wiedeman, Burgweinting, chaired the meeting. Both the German Mennonite Peace Committee and Mennonite Central Committee are members of the International Mennonite Peace Committee.

The program of this informational meeting featured four addresses with subsequent discussions:

"The Political-Social Situation in Latin America, Analyses and Future Perspectives," was given by Gottfried Deeken, sociologist and worker in the service organization of the Catholic Church in Aachen. Gerd Uwe Kliwer, Brazil, spoke on "The Churches Threat and Chance in Latin America." Jacob Warkentin, Paraguay, spoke on "The Position of the Mennonites in the Socio-Political Revolution of Latin America." "World Conference in Curitiba—Tasks, Possibilities, and Limits of the Conference" was given by J. A. Oosterbaan, Holland.

In connection with this conference, several meetings were held, including a meeting of the International Mennonite Peace Committee, a discussion between those members present of the World Conference Presidium and several delegates, and a meeting of the German Mennonite Peace Committee.

The information given in the addresses and discussions served as a learning process for the participants of the conference. The results of this learning process were summarized by those present at the conclusion of the conference in the following statements:

"Regarding the location of the conference: We plead for holding the Ninth Mennonite World Conference in Curitiba, Brazil. Moving the conference to another place would simply be evading the tasks which were set before our brotherhood with the selection of the conference site. In addition, holding the World Conference in Curitiba would offer the unique opportunity to mutually learn how we as the church of Jesus Christ in Latin America can be effective in a spirit of reconciliation.

"With this plea for Curitiba as the conference location, we would like to comment on the decision of the Dutch Mennonites not to send delegates to Brazil under certain conditions. We can well understand this decision since it shows that, in extreme cases, it may be advisable not to participate in a conference in Brazil. The participants of this meeting would also advise canceling the conference if it is impossible to conduct it according to the spirit of its theme.

"If we, however, participate in a conference in Latin America, we must be aware that we, as Europeans, can never appear as teaching masters or accusers. With our involvement in the Western political-economic system, we share in the blame for the social misery of Latin-American peoples and in the retention of dictators who with terror and murderous power assure their positions and privileges. We can react to these facts at a conference only as those who are implicated.

"Regarding the conference theme: The theme of the conference is 'Jesus Christ Reconciles.' This theme touches on the fundamentals of our existence and our task. The message of reconciliation has, however, not only a vertical dimension of God to man but also a horizontal dimension of man to man. This horizontal dimension where our relationship to all men is based upon love is required by the Scriptures of all who subscribe to reconciliation in Jesus Christ. For this reason the social and political consequences of reconciliation must be discussed at the conference, taking into account also the situation in Latin America which is charged with hate, lack of reconciliation, and power.

"We would warn against handling this horizontal dimension of reconciliation in only one of the various sections of the conference. Reconciliation with God and man is an inseparable unity. Therefore, the social and political consequences of the gospel must be fully expressed also in the main addresses. The speakers should be selected and approached with a view to preserving this unity. That means that in selecting the speakers the guiding principle should be totality of the message, intention to reconcile, and profundity of knowledge. One should not shy away from also utilizing non-Mennonite Christians if they would have more insight and knowledge in certain areas.

"Regarding planning the conference: To the Presidium of the Ninth Mennonite World Conference, we direct a request to continue at a full Presidium meeting the discussion about place and theme of the conference which has been begun and to draw the reworked viewpoints into the conference planning.

"With this explanation we would support the open letter of the International Mennonite Peace Committee of June 21, 1970, and our explanation should be understood as carrying that letter further and making it concrete."

This explanation shall be transmitted in the form of an open letter to Erland Waltner, Elkhart, Ind., and to the Mennonite papers.

Aid to Nigeria

When the war ended in Nigeria early in 1970, relief agencies decided to carry on a crash feeding program which would continue until June 30. Then all efforts would be directed toward rehabilitation work and self-help projects. The Mennonite Central Committee was informed at that time that supplies such as bedding and clothing were not to be shipped.

However, on Sept. 10, a letter from Keith Gingerich, an MCC volunteer in Nigeria, inquired if MCC could ship 500 bales of used clothing and 500 bales of blankets. He wrote, "Clothes are always in demand and blankets are presently being used in reequipping maternity homes in a rural health program, schools, and reception centers for Nigerian children returning from Gabon and the Ivory Coast. Apart from these, we will channel blankets to the southeastern state which has suffered recently from severe flooding."

Gingerich wrote in October that "while lightweight clothing is generally desirable, blankets of any weight are fine and heavyweight clothing is useful. Kwashihkor cases have lowered the body temperatures in many cases."

In another October letter, he wrote, "I have decided to request 5,000 tropical Christmas Bundles which can be sent anytime. These will be distributed primarily to children. Tropical bundles are preferred, but some regular bundles can also be used. At present we have two teams in Nigeria with MCC personnel who can distribute these. I can arrange for one or two MCC people to assist with the distribution at four or five places in addition to the two places where they are already represented."

In response to Gingerich's letters, the MCC material aid department shipped seven tons of bedding and 15 tons of clothing late in October. In December, 2,500 blankets purchased by MCC (Canada) will be shipped from Montreal.

MCC is initiating an early January shipment of 612 tons of bedding, 24 tons of clothing, 7,500 tropical Christmas Bundles, and six used sewing machines.

The total value of these shipments is $165,000. — John Hostetler, MCC Material Aid Director.

Students Told "Move with the Spirit"

"Of course I haven't been on campus long enough to understand the full story of what's happening," commented David Shank, at Eastern Mennonite College last week, "but after visiting Hesston, Goshen, and now EMC during the past month, I sense not only a desire but a hunger by the students to be involved with the deepest form of spiritual reality possible — God Himself."

Shank added, "My purpose in coming to America this month was to help bridge the gap between where the Mission Board is in its thinking and work and where the churches and the people think we are in missions."

Besides his involvement on the three college campuses, the veteran missionary to Belgium participated in Mission Forums in Hesston, Kan.; Bloomington, Ill.; Archbold, Ohio; and Harrisonburg, Va.

"What I've tried to share with both students and adults," said Shank in an interview, "is that it is not the particular tools of missions that are important. The Spirit of God in the life of the individual is most important whether he happens to be in VS or TAP or anything. The tools are useless if the persons involved with the tools and structures are not themselves Spirit-filled people."

Shank recounted experiences from his twenty years in Belgium and said that he's come to the conclusion that a Christian's role is simply one of openness to the leading of the Spirit at any time, anywhere. "We had no strategy; we just went and were led," he said.

"We're in the time of the Spirit," Shank declared. "Some say this is the time of grace, the time of the church, the last times, but these all fit under the umbrella of Pentecost." He added, "Most important is the fact that we are living in the time since the fullness of God was given to a people to live it out."

The freedom of the Spirit catches the fancy of contemporary youth, commented the missionary. "But I've told them freedom is not doing your thing, but God's thing, the Spirit's thing." He compared the working of the Spirit to the powerful and unpredictable forces of water, wind, and fire.

Telling how these forces have been at work in his own life, Shank spoke of a real infilling of the Spirit in his Belgium church shortly before his departure for America.

In his last chapel address at EMC as he spoke of the power of the Spirit, Shank said he sensed a sort of hungering and thirsting to know more, intense interest in what he was saying.

"It was a rather moving experience," he said. "I did not anticipate such a thing at EMC because I felt that there was already a bit of spiritual saturation on campus."

When Shank proposed that perhaps some wanted to give themselves to the working of the Spirit in their lives, approximately 300 faculty and students gathered around the front of the auditorium in an offering of more than money to God.

I don't know how all this will relate to the home churches, reflected Shank. "Students are not convinced that the established church is always doing what God wants it to do. The thing that impressed me as students across the country opened their lives to the work of the Spirit was that the home churches better listen very intently to what the young people are saying. The students are trained and informed about problems and social injustices, yet ready to be Spirit-filled people in such a world."

The missionary warned that the new expressions of faith and piety may differ from old patterns. "But we have to have confidence that these young people are in their time really with Him," he concluded.

Shank and his wife returned to Belgium after the last Mission Forum. They serve under the Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind. — Norman Derstine.

Participants in the VS In-Service Leadership Training Conference at Hesston, Kan., Nov. 30 to Dec. 4.

VS Leaders Convene at Hesston

Hesston (Kan.) Mennonite Church played host to approximately 40 Voluntary Service personnel assembled there for an In-Service Training Conference, Nov. 30 to Dec. 4. The conference, sponsored by the Relief and Service Division of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., brought together leadership persons from 17 units west of the Mississippi River (including Chicago) for additional orientation during their term of service.

Seventy-five percent of the VS units represented at the Hesston conference work closely with developing congregations.

College Students Discuss Issues of Faith

College and graduate students from the Lancaster Mennonite Conference met at Camp Hebron, Halifax, Pa., Dec. 19 and 20 for a retreat called "Contemporary Christians."

Sponsored by the Lancaster Conference Student Services Committee, the retreat attempted to provide a forum for contemporary issues of faith and Christian living.

Resource persons for the retreat were Arthur Gish, author of The New Left and Christian Radicalism; Wesley Mast, student chaplain of the Messiah College students at Temple University campus, Philadelphia; Walton Hackman, Executive Secretary of Peace and Social Concerns of the (Old) Mennonite Church and Associate Secretary of Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section; Don Kraby, minister at Willow Street Mennonite Church and student at Temple University; Paul M. Miller, professor of Theology at the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries, Elkhart, Ind.; and Jay Garber, student at Millersville State College and minister at the New Danville Mennonite Church.

The Lancaster Conference Student Services Committee was formed early this year. The SSC attempts to encourage intellectual and spiritual interchange among

Gospel Herald, December 29, 1970
Mennonite students on secular campuses.
An SSC member pointed out that in 1962, 70 percent of Lancaster Mennonite college students attended Mennonite colleges; now 70 percent attend secular schools. The SSC is composed of two members appointed by Lancaster Mennonite Conference — James Shank (bishop) and Simon Kravbill (Youth Services Director) — and two members appointed by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions — Larry Newsanger (Secretary of Personnel) and Chester Wenger (Secretary of Home Missions and Evangelism). Wenger is also a member of the General Mennonite Student Services Committee based in Elkhart, Ind.

Twent-four Attend Orientation
Twent-four persons attended the last 1970 orientation class held Oct. 27 to Nov. 10. Twelve persons accepted overseas assignments and 12 persons accepted Voluntary Service assignments in the U.S., including one new unit in Akron, Ohio.

From the Mennonite Church: Linda Bechtel, Kitchener, Ont., has begun a one-year term of Voluntary Service as secretary in the Europe-North Africa Department at MCC headquarters. She is a graduate of Waterloo-Oxford District Secondary School and a member of the Mannheim Mennonite Church, Peters burg, Ont.

Albert and Annie Drudge, Stouf ville, Ont., have accepted a two-year assignment in India. After 25 years of farming in Ontario, the Drudges will be managing a herd of 250 Holstein cattle shipped from Britain to India. They are members of the Steele's Avenue Mennonite Church, Markham, Ont.

Paul Hartman, Elida, Ohio, has accepted a two-year term of Voluntary Service rehabilitating old houses at Akron, Ohio. He is a graduate of Gomer High School and a member of the Pike Mennonite Church, Elida, Ohio.

Lois Kulp, Telford, Pa., has begun a one-year term of service as hostess at MCC headquarters. She is a graduate of the Souderton High School and a member of the Finland Mennonite Church, Penn burg, Pa.

Lowell Jantzi, Archbold, Ohio, has begun a three-year term of Pax service in Vietnam working in community development. He has a BA degree in economics from Goshen College and attended the Zion Mennonite Church, Archbold, Ohio.

Richard Nachigtal, Fresno, Calif., has begun a two-year term of Voluntary Service as psychiatric aide at Brook Lane Psychiatric Center, Hagerstown, Md., after serving a short term at the National Institute of Health as a normal control patient. He has a BS degree in industrial technology from Long Beach State College and is a member of the Mennonite Community Church, Fresno, Calif.

Terry Stuckey, Archbold, Ohio, has begun a three-month term of French language study in Brussels before beginning a two-year term of Pax service in the Congo. He received a BS in biology from Goshen College and is a member of the Lockport Mennonite Church, Stryker, Ohio.

Sam Wyse, Archbold, Ohio, has accepted a 27-month term of Pax service in the Congo where he will be involved in agricultural extension work. He received an AA degree from Hesston College and is a member of the Lockport Mennonite Church, Stryker, Ohio.

Galen Yoder, Wellman, Iowa, has begun a 27-month term of Pax service in agricultural extension work in the Congo. He is a graduate of Iowa Mennonite School and a member of the West Union Mennonite Church, Parnell, Iowa.

Nader Talks About Legitimized Violence
"If we don't wake up, a generation from now Americans will look back on the wreckage and wonder why we couldn't sacrifice so little to save so much," said consumer crusader Ralph Nader, in a Nov. 30 lecture at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va.

We recognize certain kinds of violence. Mr. Nader said, citing campus unrest and crime in the streets, but we fail to recognize the far greater violence of environmental pollution and other man-made hazards.

The law has "no relevance" to this kind of violence, he said. No one person is responsible. No fines are levied on culpable individuals primarily because in the corporation complex it is almost impossible to pass an "organizational judgment."

"This country has legitimized violence that is associated with economic activity," Mr. Nader said. "It is the price of progress."

Mr. Nader exploded three myths surrounding pollution. We do have technology and money to stop pollution, he said, and there is a definite correlation between pollution and many forms of illness and death.

"We need a new ethic," he continued. "It is thought to be unpatriotic to burn the national flag, but not to pollute the water, air, and land which make up this country."

Mr. Nader feels that the Judeo-Christian churches have failed in developing the concept of organizational sin which is necessary to produce such a new ethic.

Moving into the field of consumer abuse, Mr. Nader singled out the automobile as the classic example of man having to bend to technology, rather than technology being designed to the needs of man.

The food industry is only one example of the many corporations which rope the consumer into paying for defects in products. The fraud which is tolerated is driving out the honest businessman and has kept facts of vital importance from the buying public, he continued.

Mr. Nader called for strategy mapped out by citizens who are technically equipped to fight corporate injustice. "We have allowed consumer strengths to be stripped away by a few corporations, but the problems are reaching the breaking point. Nature can be abused so long and then it turns on its abuser."

The radicals of this country are not the youth, Mr. Nader concluded. They are the corporation members who have violated all the conservative tenets of free enterprise.

Sell All You Have, and Give
A student at Fresno Pacific College has felt the call to sell his possessions and give to the needy. This young artist, sensitive to the needs of people, especially those people recently caught in the natural and man-made disasters of Jordan and East Pakistan, spoke to his pastor at the Clovis Mennonite Brethren Church, Fresno, Calif., and out of his convictions made a decision to sell his paintings done over the past several years, and give all the money to suffering people.

The student artist committed the proceeds from his paintings to Mennonite Central Committee's programs of relief in Jordan. and East Pakistan. H. H. Dick, an MCC member from Fresno, Calif., reported to the MCC Executive Committee meeting at Akron, Pa., Dec. 10, that he had in his pocket a check for $1,000 sent as the initial installment of this student's commitment. He reported that $500 would follow. "The artist charged sales tax on his paintings," said Dick, "and now, having given all he received, I wonder how he will pay his taxes at the end of the year."

Graber Named Program Adviser

Throughout the entire Mennonite Central Committee program, the need for more depth-in-program planning is being recognized. MCC's Latin America office recently launched a program in which one of its volunteers will travel from unit to unit to give help with the problem of development.

Cecil Graber, Freeman, S.D., has been named MCC program adviser for Latin America. He will be responsible for working with the individual country directors to achieve greater program depth and effectiveness by acquainting himself with what is being done by other government and private agencies and adapting such experiences to MCC. He will serve as a resource for literature, technical advice, seeds and equipment, assist the country directors with program planning and evaluation, and be available to conduct seminar workshops with MCC workers or community groups on specialized subjects related to development administration.

Graber's assignment will take him to MCC projects in Brazil, Haiti, Mexico, Honduras, Colombia, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Peru.

Christian Group Releases New Peace Materials

Christians for Peace represent a group of Christians — mostly Mennonites and Brethren from the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia — who believe that peace must first be lived, then spoken.

Eugene K. Souder, Mennonite pastor and coordinator for the group, says, "We intend to give a positive witness for peace. Not the hot-mouthed rhetoric of the radicals, nor the stiff-necked reactions of the far right — there's been enough polarizing already. We think the message of the Prince of Peace needs hearing and seeing and digesting, and we want to share it in a manner becoming to Christian men and women."

The group began in June of this year by issuing a newspaper ad, wall poster, and window decals with the message, "Peace Is Patriotic." These items got immediate reception and the first printing of 11,000 decals and 2,000 posters found their way into over 40 cities, including Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. Servicemen also wrote for materials.

With this enthusiastic response the group went to work at revising the materials plus adding new ones. A bumper sticker bearing the words "Peace Is Patriotic," together with a large dove-world design, is done up attractively in red, white, and blue.

A Christmas card also bearing a dove-world design carries this copy: "Making peace is a life style, Calming hearts and hatreds, Bringing Christ's forgiving peace. Building bridges of love and understanding. That's what Christmas is about." Below a dove-world design is the Bible text, "And his name shall be called the Prince of Peace."

A gold foil seal for use on envelopes is also a first for Christians for Peace with the message: "Peace Is a Lifestyle — Blessed are the peacemakers."

Christians for Peace has plans to expand its work into all areas of mass communications as funds are available. The organization is operating on a nonprofit basis and invites interested persons to become members Charter membership $10.00 Student membership: $3.00 Address all correspondence to Christians for Peace, Box 206, Harrisonburg, Va. 22801

Christians for Peace is encouraging similar groups to form in localities across the United States, Canada, and abroad.

European Mennonites Establish Witness in Dachau

A new Center for Christian witness is being planned by European Mennonites for Dachau, Germany. The Executive Committee of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, Salunga, Pa., acted in their Dec. 4 meeting to assist the Dachau effort with $4,000 in 1971.

Dachau, of World War II Nazi prison camp notoriety, is a city of over 40,000 with no "free" church (non-Lutheran or non-Catholic), although scattered members of free churches live in the area. The Mennonite Home Mission — a European Mennonite mission group — has decided to establish the new Center there and call it the Free Church Missionary Fellowship.

The Mennonite Home Mission already has... established a similar mission in Freising, a city of 30,000. An ordained man, Wilfried Kundlach, and his family went there for full-time work. They are gathering the scattered Mennonite and Baptist Christians in Freising. The Kundlachs are also beginning an effective outreach into the community, particularly through Bible study, personal contacts, and children's activities.

The Mennonite Home Mission was organized in 1960 by interested members of the Verband Conference in the Munich, Eichstock, Ingelstadt area. While the mission is not officially related to the conference, it enjoys a good relationship with the conference; several pastors and church leaders are involved.

Church Becomes Self-Supporting

On Oct. 25, John Powell, executive secretary of Minority Ministries with Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., presented the property deeds to the Ninth Street Mennonite Church in Saginaw, Mich. The presentation took place during dedication services in recognition of the congregation's completed building program and self-supporting status. Powell also delivered a dedicatory address, "The Church Scattered."

Ninth Street Church began in the late 1940s when former pastor LeRoy Bechler moved to 1130 North Eighth Street in Saginaw and held church and Sunday school services in his home. In 1951 the present building was constructed at 1118 North Ninth Street and opened its doors to the surrounding community. In 1960 the family moved to Los Angeles, Calif., where Bechler now pastors the interracial Calvary Mennonite Church in Inglewood.

The Marvin Sweigart family moved to Saginaw in 1961 and has served the congregation since that time. In 1966 the congregation called one of its members, Lee Lowery, to assist with pastoral responsibilities. From the beginning Ninth Street Mennonite Church received financial subsidy from the Home Missions Division of Mennonite Board of Missions. With the cessation of this relationship on April 1, 1970, Ninth Street became the second totally indigenous financially independent Mennonite congregation in Saginaw, Grace Chapel, established in 1960, became fully self-supporting on Jan. 1, 1969.

VS-er Transfers to Washington Peace Office

Peace is on the minds of many in these times. It is an issue on which some people serving with the Mennonite Central Committee Voluntary Service are acting this year.

On Nov. 30, one volunteer began working in the MCC Peace Section Washington Office assisting Delton Franz, director, in activities which will permit interested members of the constituency to be more completely informed of the activities of the government and of the Peace Section. John Swarr, New Providence, Pa., will complete his term with MCC at the Washington office after having served 15 months at Wiltwyck School for Boys, Yorktown Heights, N.Y. Supporting funds will be generated from the combined earnings of VS-ers serving with MCC.

As funds become available, MCC VS will propose a grant of up to $5,000 for the MCC Peace Section in 1971. These monies will provide for an expanded program chiefly in the area of peace education for constituent groups. Again, these funds will be made available from the earnings of MCC volunteers.

Committee Challenges Mennonites to "Try Hunger"

The Executive Committee of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, Salunga, at their Nov. 20 meeting approved recent actions taken by the Board's Relief Committee.

The Relief Committee studied the validity of the "Try Hunger" program in which families throughout the Lancaster Mennonite Conference eat a meal costing approximately six cents per person and send the money saved to Eastern Board for relief work.

Norman G. Shenk, secretary of the Relief Committee, said, "The committee felt that 'Try Hunger' carries a significant call to self-denial and sacrificial sharing which seems biblical." The Relief Committee recommended to the Women's Work Coordinating Committee of Lancaster Mennonite Conference that the "Try Hunger" program be considered more often than once each year.

The Women's Work Coordinating Committee recently acted favorably on this recommendation: Lancaster Mennonites will now participate in "Try Hunger" four times each year on the fifteenth of February, May, August, and November.

In another action the Relief Committee approved and recommended the 1971 relief budget proposal totaling $164,400. They also appropriated $27,200 to various relief programs of the Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa. Department.

Of the $27,200, a special appropriation of $10,000 was made to MCC's Paraguay Indian Settlement Agricultural Development Program. Two thousand dollars were designated to Jordan relief for blankets and tents in Amman. It was reported that approximately $3,000 had already been advanced for the MCC Peru disaster project from designated available contributions.

The Relief Committee appropriated $14,000 from Food for Relief funds to MCC for overseas general relief purposes and marked $1,200 for MCC Mennonite Disaster Service administration.

Group Meets Selective Service Chief

On Nov. 9, a five-person delegation, organized by the Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section, met with Curtis W. Tarr, director of Selective Service. In the discussion with Tarr were three of his aides and two representatives of the National Interreligions Service Board of Conscientious Objectors (NISBCO). Mennonite and Brethren in Christ representatives were: William Keeney, chairman of the MCC Peace Section; William T. Snyder, executive secretary of MCC; H. H. Dick, general secretary of the U.S. Conference of the Mennonite Brethren; John Stoner, chairman of the Peace and Social Concerns Commission of the Brethren in Christ; and John A. Lapp, executive secretary of the MCC Peace Section.

The purpose of the meeting was to acquaint the new director of Selective Service with the Mennonites, who are and what they believe, on such issues as war, the draft, and alternate service. The traditional Mennonite position of opposing conscription was emphasized, as was the church's recognition of noncooperation as a valid expression of nonconformity. Non-cooperation is not a new position for Mennonites, particularly for those who remember the experience of World War I. What is new in the present situation is that peace church members, who constituted a vast majority of COs and alternate service personnel before 1965, are now a distinct minority and become more so each month.

The group urged Selective Service to give the widest recognition possible to freedom of conscience and that provisions should be made for men whose conscientious objection to war develops late in the conscription process.

Tarr repeatedly emphasized the difficulty of administering a nationwide system of local draft boards and that the majority of Americans believe national defense is a priority that necessitates the draft. He also pointed out that the number of granted CO claims is soaring and that he is trying to make the program work in the best way possible.

There was considerable discussion on broader recognition to sincere COs not associated with the peace churches, and on alternate models, such as in England and Holland, for the treatment of objectors.

Tarr is a 6 ft. 7 in. Californian. He has served on the faculty of Stanford University and was president of Lawrence University before joining the Department of Defense in 1969. His aides in the meeting were George Jensen, chief of operations; Daniel Crown, deputy director of operations; and Kenneth Coffey, public information officer. Coffey is also serving as chairman of a task force reviewing the alternate service program.

Meetings with Selective Service have been a feature of Peace Section activities since its formation in 1942. Lewis B. Hershey was the director of Selective Service for all these years until April 1970. The function of Selective Service is to secure persons to staff the military of the United States. The Peace Section, representing Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches, considers the providing of draft-related services to its constituent churches as one of its most important functions. Churches made up of persons committed to the Christian way of love, and who say no to war, need to be perennally vigilant in the pursuit of freedom of conscience and freedom from military service.

Nine Baptized into House of Fellowship

Manoel, a government worker in Gama, a satellite city (pop. 80,000) of Brasilia, capital city of Brazil, is leading a small group of believers and seekers in his home. On Sunday evening, Nov. 22, nine persons were baptized in Manoel's house. The members of the small group of believers together decided who was ready for baptism. Cecil Ashley, executive secretary of Assisicavo Evangelica Menonita, the Mennonite mission in Sao Paulo State, visited Gama to conduct the baptisms. Forty to fifty people crowded into Manoel's house for the two-hour service.

O. B. Hochstetler, bookstore managers in Brasilia and the satellite city of Taguatinga, and Mike Yoder, Overseas Missions Associate teaching English in a language institute in Brasilia, are cooperating in the lay leadership of the house church begun at the initiative of Manoel. Morning and evening services are conducted on Sundays, and visits are made throughout the week. Celso, a young man who recently moved to Brasilia from Sao Paulo, is interested in cooperating with the work.

Manoel was mayor of the town of Araquacena in North Brazil before moving with his family and relatives to the Federal District. Mennonite Board of Missions personel first went to Araquacena in 1955.

FIELD NOTES

Last December Eastern Mennonite College students were shipping meals to help raise funds for a new library. The week of Dec. 7 they shipped 1,015 meals and donated the money to aid victims of the recent disaster in East Pakistan.

Money from the meals plus other faculty and student contributions amounting to nearly $2,000 will be forwarded to Mennonite Central Committee in Akron, Pa. MCC is supplying $35,000 worth of material aid and hardware to East Pakistan.

"Nepal: On the Potter's Wheel," a 16mm color film which vividly pictures the work of the United Mission to Nepal (UMN) is now available from Mennonite Central Committee through its film library for use in constituent churches.

The 35-minute film presents an accurate picture of the tremendous scenery, rich historical and cultural heritage, and great needs of Nepal. The film takes one on a visit to the ten projects of the UMN, including Butwal Technical Institute where seven MCC volunteers are serving. The young emerging Nepal church is also depicted. Congregations or individuals wishing to order the film should write to Information Services, Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa. 17501.

Wilford Stutzman, Keota, Iowa, was ordained bishop for the South English Mennonite Fellowship on Dec. 6. The service was in charge of Dale Oswald assisted by Edwin Knapp.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

This word in appreciation of Dec. 8, pages 1012, 1013 article "To Resist or Not to Resist, That Is the Question" by Dean M. Brubaker — and your publishing it. I agree with his viewpoint about 100 percent, and feel it fits excellently what it seems to me is our historic church position.

Implementation changes from time to time of course, but the source of scriptural truth does not. I hope many read it carefully. Best wishes, — Orie O. Miller, Akron, Pa.

Births

"Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord" (Psalm 127:3)

Kaufman, Alvin M. and Edna (Kohns), Plain City, Ohio, third child, first son, John Mark, Nov. 26, 1970.

Kenagy, Carroll and Beulah Frances (Driver), Portland, Ore., first child, Randy Christopher, Dec. 3, 1970.

Roes, Norman and Sharon (Zehr), Millerton, Ont., second child, first daughter, Wendy Darlene, Dec. 6, 1970.

News reporting in America is distorted, says Spiro Agnew.

He hasn't read Christian Living yet.

Vice-President Agnew's attack on the American news media last November held a nugget of truth. Bad news does tend to dominate today. But would anyone turn off a live, exciting confrontation between angry whites and blacks to hear the story of a handful of white carpenters pounding nails under supervision of Pittsburgh's United Black Front?

Christian Living thinks so, and ran an eight-page report on Pittsburgh's Hill District project in March 1970. The most exciting news today is not exploding on city streets. It is wide-awake Christians cooling off hot streets, healing hurt people.

"Instant analysis of complex problems," criticized the Vice-President.

Well, who wants to wait half a year to hear a news story?

Yet Christian Living ran the story of Eastern Mennonite College's $111,000 work-drive half a year afterward, complete with photos, twenty-five quotes from students and leaders who helped in the last-minute fund push to make a federal grant deadline for the new library, and interpretation by seasoned reporter Jim Fairfield (National Geographic's report of the drive only beat Christian Living's by a few weeks.) The complete story takes a little more time. For the news of the hour, read your local newspaper. For a quick understanding so you can carry a conversation at coffee break tomorrow, watch the late news.

For the meanings behind the news and for the Christian viewpoint, read Christian Living.
